PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

SINCE the publication of the Sixth Edition of this work (in 1896) there has been a good deal of legislation with reference to the criminal law, both as to crimes, punishments, appeals, evidence and costs : but no apparent progress has been made towards the codification of Criminal Law or Criminal Procedure for England or Ireland. In this respect the Imperial Legislature has failed to profit by the example of the self-governing dominions of the King, such as Canada, New Zealand, Queensland and Western Australia, and of the Crown Colonies, which have in numerous instances adopted Criminal Codes framed on a model drafted by the late Sir Robert S. Wright, and subsequently revised for the Colonial Office.

Until Criminal Law and Procedure are re-arranged and simplified by codification it is still necessary to seek for them in a mass of scattered enactments and a congeries of judicial decisions of varying authority, and in the works of the old writers on the common law. The bulk of these enactments and decisions are embodied or referred to in this work. The aim of the present Editors has been to revise and shorten the text, and to re-arrange those materials which are of present value in a manner which may render them more easy of access and understanding. They have retained the characteristic feature of former editions, of a fairly full statement of the facts of the more important cases quoted, which has been found convenient for persons who have not the reports to hand : but it has been deemed desirable to re-arrange the titles and chapters in a more systematic manner than can be found in former editions.

The new arrangement follows the main lines of the Draft

Code of 1880: but the Editors have followed the lead of the author and former editors in omitting the subject of Treason and Treason-Felony.

Decisions on repealed statutes, where of use as authorities on the existing law, are incorporated with the text, and cases overridden by legislation are omitted. Decisions of substantial value or interest given since the publication of the last edition in 1896 have been included up to July, 1909.

The recent changes made in 1907 and 1908 with respect to the punishment of crime have rendered it necessary to set out, in Book I. Chapter VII., a fuller statement of the law as to punishment.

The portions of the Sixth Edition which dealt with procedure have been collected in Book XII., where also will be found the legislation of 1907 and 1908 as to Appeal and Costs in Criminal Cases.

The subject of evidence, treated in the earlier editions by Mr. E. Vaughan Williams, author of 'Williams on Executors,' and afterwards a judge of the Common Pleas, is dealt with in Book XIII., where in Chapter V. will be found the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898.

The Editors have been able somewhat to reduce the bulk of the text: but to effect this they have had to omit the subject of Highway and Bridge indictments. The reason which ultimately decided them to make this omission was, that such indictments, though public remedies, can no longer be regarded as criminal proceedings: for they have been assimilated to civil proceedings as to evidence (40 & 41 Vict. c. 14), appeal (7 Edw. VII. c. 23 s. 20 (3)), and costs (8 Edw. VII. c. 15 s. 9 (3)).

References to the criminal law of the United States have been advisedly reduced; since those who wish to study that law must necessarily refer to some standard American writers on Crimes, such as Bishop, and to the Codes of the States of the Union.

But the Editors have included references to decisions of the Courts of Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, and of some other colonies in which the English authorities have been considered, and decisions have been given which may be of value with reference to certain parts of the English law, on which that of the colony is based.

The Editors have been careful to retain the valuable notes of Mr. C. S. Greaves, Q.C., editor of the Third and Fourth Editions, and draftsman of the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861. The cases marked MSS. C. S. G. are from his collection. Those marked MS. H. S. are from the collection of Mr. Horace Smith, editor of the Sixth Edition. Those marked MS. Bayley, J., are from a collection made by Mr. Justice Bayley.

References to series of reports not mentioned in the text have so far as possible been inserted in the Table of Cases. Repealed statutes (save in a few special cases) are not included in the Table of Statutes; but in the notes to existing Statutes will be found references to the former enactments which they supersede.

The Editors have to thank Mr. H. D. Roome, Barrister-at-Law, for valuable aid in preparing the Table of Cases.

PREFACE TO CANADIAN NOTES

The Canada Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act treat of the greater part of the subjects dealt with in the text of RUSSELL ON CRIMES. To set out these statutes herein would make these volumes unwieldy; to accurately express the meaning of the statutes more concisely would be impossible; and therefore these notes are necessarily confined to references to the statutory provisions and to judicial interpretations thereof.

As the Editors state in the preface, the text of RUSSELL ON CRIMES follows the arrangement of the English Draft Code, which is not the same as that of the Canada Criminal Code. These notes necessarily follow the order of the text, and as to subject matter do not go beyond the text except in reference to appeals in indictable offences, for which reasons there are no notes upon summary convictions or appeals therefrom, and few upon summary or speedy trials; but though the text contains nothing about certiorari, and little comparatively about the practice upon appeal, it has been considered advisable to refer extensively to these subjects in these notes.

By permission of the publisher, the writer has drawn extensively on the matter contained in "Canada Criminal Law," by W. J. Tremear, a work so excellent and complete that it would be difficult to quote an important and relevant decision by Canadian Courts not referred to therein, save those given since that work was published.

Very valuable assistance in the preparation of these notes has been given by my son, A. Nevill Morine, LL.B.

A TREATISE ON CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS.

BOOK THE FIRST.

PRELIMINARY MATTERS.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES DEALING WITH CRIMES.

THE object of this work is to treat of crimes—i.e. of those acts or omissions involving breach of a duty to which by the law of England a sanction is attached by way of punishment or pecuniary penalty in the public interest. The same acts or omissions may give a cause of civil action to an individual injured thereby. But in the case of crime the ordinary remedy is by indictment (a)—i.e. by accusation made by twelve or more grand jurors, and by trial thereon before a petty jury of twelve, unless statutory provision is made for punishing the offence in a summary or a different mode.

The general canons of construction applicable to statutes which create or punish criminal offences, or deal with criminal procedure, are in substance the same as those applicable to other statutes. There are numerous authorities in which it is said that penal statutes must be construed strictly, a rule founded on the plain principle that the power of punishment is vested in the Legislature, in which lies the authority to define crimes and ordain punishment (b). The true rule is that stated in the Gauntlet (c). ‘No doubt all penal statutes are to be construed strictly—that is to say, the Court must see that the thing charged as an offence is within the plain meaning of the words used ; must not strain the words on any notion that there has been a slip, that there has been a casus omissus ; that the thing is so clearly within the mischief that it must have been intended to be included, and would have been included if thought of. On the other hand, the person charged has a right to say that the thing charged, though within the words, is not within the spirit of the enactment. But where the thing is brought within the words and within the spirit, there a penal enactment is to be construed, like any other instrument, according to the fair common-sense meaning of the language used ; and the Court is not to find or make any doubt or ambiguity in the language of a penal statute where such doubt or ambiguity would clearly not be found or made in the same language in any other instrument ' (d).

(b) Att.-Gen. v. Sillem [1863], 2 H. & C.

in giving the judgment of the Judicial Committee (Mellish, L.J., James, L.J., and Sir James Colville and Sir Montague Smith). Cf. 2 H. & C. 531, Bramwell, B.

Observance of this canon is chiefly invoked to prevent the creation of offences by construction—i.e. to restrain the Courts from usurping the function of the Legislature by extending the words of a statute to acts or omissions not within its plain terms or manifest intention. But it does not debar the judges from reading into a statute creating an offence words omitted but obviously necessary to complete the clear intention of the Legislature (e).

The presumption against giving a retrospective operation to statutes operates most strongly in the case of statutes creating crimes (f).

An important rule of construction which has been applied to criminal statutes is that there is no vested right in procedure. Sect. 27 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904 (4 Edw. VII. c. 15), which was passed on August 15, 1904, and came into force on October 1, 1904 (sect. 33 (3)), directed that six months should be substituted for three months as the limit of time for instituting prosecutions for carnally knowing a girl of the age of thirteen and under sixteen (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 5 (1)). C. D. was tried in January 1905 on an indictment charging the commission of such offence on July 15, 1904. The proceedings were instituted on December 27, 1904. It was held that sect. 27 dealt only with procedure, and came into force at a time when the accused was liable to prosecution, and extended the time during which he continued liable (g).

Certain definitions of terms often used in statutes creating crimes are included in the Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63) (h). Of these the more important are as follows :—

Gender and Number.—By sect. 1 : '(1) In this Act and in every Act passed after the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty, whether before or after the commencement of this Act (January 1, 1890), unless the contrary intention appears, (a) words importing the masculine gender shall include females, and (b) words in the singular shall include the plural and words in the plural shall include the singular.

' (2) The same rules shall be observed in the construction of every enactment relating to an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction when the enactment is contained in an Act passed in or before the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty.'

In R. v. Palin [1906], 1 K.B. 7, the words 'any document' in the second part of s. 1 of the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 24), were limited, by reference to the preamble, to documents belonging to the employer of the accused.

By sect. 2: '(1) In the construction of every enactment relating to an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, whether contained in an Act passed before or after the commencement of this Act, the expression "person" shall, unless the contrary intention appears, include a body corporate' (i).

'(2) Where, under any Act, whether passed before or after the commencement of this Act, any forfeiture or penalty is payable to a party aggrieved, it shall be payable to a body corporate in every case where that body is the party aggrieved.'

By sect. 3: 'In every Act passed after the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, the following expressions shall, unless the contrary intention appears, have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, namely:

'The expression "month" shall mean calendar month' (j).

'The expressions "oath" and "affidavit" shall, in the case of persons for the time being allowed by law to affirm or declare instead of swearing, include affirmation and declaration, and the expression "swear" shall, in the like case, include affirm and declare.'

By sect. 4: 'In every Act passed after the year 1850 and before the commencement of this Act (January 1, 1890) the expression "county" shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as including a county of a city and a county of a town.'

By sect. 13: 'In this Act, and in every other Act, whether passed before or after the commencement of this Act, the following expressions shall, unless the contrary intention appears, have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, namely:

'(4) The expression "court of assize" shall, as respects England, Wales, and Ireland, mean a court of assize, a court of oyer and terminer, and a court of gaol delivery, or any of them, and shall, as respects England and Wales, include the Central Criminal Court.

'(5) The expression "assizes," as respects England, Wales, and Ireland, shall mean the courts of assize usually held in every year, and shall include the sessions of the Central Criminal Court, but shall not include any court of assize held by virtue of any special commission, or, as respects Ireland, any court held by virtue of the powers conferred by section sixty-three of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Ireland), 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 57).

'(10) The expression "the Summary Jurisdiction Acts," when used in relation to England or Wales, shall mean the Summary Jurisdiction

(j) At common law month primarily means 'lunar' month. Bruner v. Moore [1904], 1 Ch. 305, Farwell, J. This enactment applies only to the term as used in statutes. By s. 12 (1) of the Prison Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 41): 'In any sentence of imprisonment passed after the commencement of this Act (January 1, 1899) the word month shall, unless the contrary is expressed, be construed as meaning calendar month.' By subsec. 2: 'A prisoner whose term of imprisonment or penal servitude expires on any Sunday, Christmas Day, or Good Friday, shall be discharged on the day next preceding.' Subject to this enactment, a person sentenced to a month's imprisonment is entitled to be discharged on the day in the next month immediately preceding the day corresponding to the one on which his sentence takes effect. Migotti v. Colvill, 4 C. P.D. 233: 48 L. J. C.P. 695.

(England) Acts (k), and when used in relation to Scotland the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, and when used in relation to Ireland the Summary Jurisdiction (Ireland) Acts.

‘(11) The expression “court of summary jurisdiction” shall mean any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrate, by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is authorised to act under, the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, whether in England, Wales, or Ireland, and whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his commission, or under the common law (l).’

‘(14) The expression “court of quarter sessions” shall mean the justices of any county, riding, parts, division, or liberty of a county, or of any county of a city or county of a town, in general or quarter sessions assembled, and shall include the court of the recorder of a municipal borough having a separate court of quarter sessions.’

Person.—By sect. 19: ‘In this Act and in every Act passed after the commencement of this Act the expression “person” shall, unless the contrary intention appears, include any body of persons, corporate or unincorporate.’

Writing.—By sect. 20: ‘In this Act and in every other Act, whether passed before or after the commencement of this Act, expressions referring to writing shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as including references to printing, lithography, photography, and other modes of representing or reproducing words in a visible form.’

Committed for Trial.—By sect. 27: ‘In every Act passed after the commencement of this Act the expression “committed for trial” used in relation to any person shall, unless the contrary intention appears, mean, as respects England and Wales, committed to prison with the view of being tried before a judge and jury, whether the person is committed in pursuance of section twenty-two or of section twenty-five of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), or is committed by a court, judge, coroner, or other authority having power to commit a person to any prison with a view to his trial, and shall include a person who is admitted to bail upon a recognisance to appear and take his trial before a judge and jury.’

Offences under two or more Laws.—By sect. 33: ‘Where an act or omission constitutes an offence under two or more Acts, or both under an Act and at common law, whether any such Act was passed before or after the commencement of this Act, the offender shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of those Acts, or at common law, but shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same offence’ (m).

Distance.—By sect. 34: ‘In the measurement of any distance for the purposes of any Act passed after the commencement of this Act, that distance shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be measured in a straight line on a horizontal plane' (n).

Citation of Acts.—By sect. 35: '(1) In any act, instrument, or document, an Act may be cited by reference to the short title (o), if any, of the Act, either with or without a reference to the chapter, or by reference to the regnal year in which the Act was passed, and where there are more statutes or sessions than one in the same regnal year, by reference to the statute or the session, as the case may require, and where there are more chapters than one, by reference to the chapter, and any enactment may be cited by reference to the section or subsection of the Act in which the enactment is contained (p).

'(2) Where any Act passed after the commencement of this Act contains such reference as aforesaid, the reference shall, unless a contrary intention appears, be read as referring, in the case of statutes included in any revised edition of the statutes purporting to be printed by authority, to that edition, and in the case of statutes not so included, and passed before the reign of King George the First, to the edition prepared under the direction of the Record Commission; and in other cases to the copies of the statutes purporting to be printed by the King's Printer or under the superintendence or authority of His Majesty's Stationery Office.

'(3) In any Act passed after the commencement of this Act a description or citation of a portion of another Act shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as including the word, section, or other part mentioned or referred to as forming the beginning and as forming the end of the portion comprised in the description or citation.'

Effect of Repeal.—By sect. 11: '(1) Where an Act passed after the year 1850, whether before or after the commencement of this Act (January 1, 1890), repeals a repealing enactment, it shall not be construed as reviving any enactment previously repealed, unless words are added reviving that enactment.

(2) Where an Act passed after the year 1850, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, repeals wholly or partially any former enactment and substitutes provisions for the enactment repealed, the repealed enactment shall remain in force until the substituted provisions come into operation.

By sect. 38: '(1) Where this Act, or any Act passed after the commencement of this Act (January 1, 1890), repeals and re-enacts, with or without modification, any provisions of a former Act, references in any other Act to the provisions so repealed shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as references to the provisions so re-enacted.

'(2) Where this Act, or any Act passed after the commencement of this Act, repeals any other enactment, then, unless the contrary intention appears, the repeal shall not—

- ‘ (a) revive anything not in force or existing at the time at which the repeal takes effect ; or
- ‘ (b) affect the previous operation of any enactment so repealed or anything duly done or suffered under any enactments so repealed ; or
- ‘ (c) affect any right, privilege, obligation, or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under any enactment so repealed ; or
- ‘ (d) affect any penalty, forfeiture, or punishment incurred in respect of any offence committed against any enactment so repealed ; or (q)
- ‘ (e) affect any investigation, legal proceeding, or remedy in respect of any such right, privilege, obligation, liability, penalty, forfeiture, or punishment as aforesaid ; and any such investigation, legal proceeding, or remedy may be instituted, continued, or enforced, and any such penalty, forfeiture, or punishment may be imposed, as if the repealing Act had not been passed.’

In the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 100), ‘ the word “ indictment ” shall be understood to include “ information ” (r), “ inquisition ” (s), and “ presentment ” (t), as well as “ indictment,” and also any “ plea,” “ replication,” or other pleading, and any “ nisi prius record ” (u), and the term “ finding of the indictment ” shall be understood to include the “ taking of an inquisition,” the “ exhibiting of an information,” and “ the making of a presentment ” ’ (sect. 30).

Effect on Common Law or on Prior Legislation.—The effect of sect. 33 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, is to create a presumption (v) that offences created by modern Acts are cumulative upon, and not in substitution for, offences at common law or under prior statutes not expressly repealed.

The provision creating a presumption against the right to punish the offender twice for the same offence is in accord with the common law rule (w). It appears not to bar a prosecution.

In considering statutes relating to crime it has to be determined whether they override or supplement the common law or prior statutes, and whether the remedies, procedure, or punishments which they enact are exclusive of those existing or alternative to or cumulative on them.

In R. v. Thompson (x), however, it was held that an indictment

(g) Thus the Larceny Act, 1901, does not, by repealing ss. 75, 76 of the Larceny Act, 1861, affect liability to punishment for offences under those sections committed before the time when the Act of 1901 took effect.

(x) 16 Q.B. 832 ; sed quare. The ratio decidendi was that conspiracy was a common law offence.

for conspiracy to violate a statute would lie after the repeal of the statute.

Effect of Repeal of Statutes creating Offences.—‘It has been long established that when an Act of Parliament is repealed, it must be considered (except as to transactions passed and closed) as if it had never existed’ (y). Where, therefore, a justice of the peace, under 13 Geo. III. c. 78, s. 24, presented the inhabitants of a parish for the non-repair of a highway, and the proceedings were removed into the Court of Queen’s Bench, and the defendants pleaded, and issues of fact were joined, and a verdict found against the defendants, and the issues had been joined before, but tried after, the day on which the Highway Act, 1835 (z) (which repealed 13 Geo. III. c. 78), came into operation, the judgment was arrested, on the ground that the power to give judgment upon a presentment under 13 Geo. III. c. 78 was gone (a). So where the liability to repair certain highways in a parish was taken away from the parish by statute, and cast upon certain townships, and the statute gave a form of indictment against the townships for non-repair, and one of the townships was indicted under the statute, but before the trial the statute was repealed, and a verdict was found against the township, the judgment was arrested, on the ground that, although whatever had been done under the Act before it was repealed was valid, the statute when repealed was, with regard to any future operation, as if it had never existed, and the effect of the repeal is the same whether the alteration affects procedure only or matter of substance (b). So where a prisoner was indicted for privately stealing in a shop against 10 & 11 Will. III. c. 23, which was repealed (1 Geo. IV. c. 117, s. 1) after the commission, but before the trial, of the offence, it was held that the prisoner could not be sentenced under the repealed Act (c), there being no special clause in the repealing Act continuing the repealed Act as to matters arising before the repeal took effect (d).

Repealing Acts, however, sometimes contain clauses for the purpose of keeping alive the statutes they repealed so far as they relate to offences committed against them, and in repeals effected after 1889 there is a presumption to this effect (e). Where a bankrupt had committed an offence against 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 251, and an information had been laid before a magistrate for that offence, and a warrant issued for the prisoner’s apprehension before 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134 came into operation, which by sect. 230 repealed the former Act, except as to ‘any proceeding pending,’ &c., ‘or any penalty incurred,’ &c., at the commencement of the Act, it was held that there was a proceeding pending within the meaning of this exception, and that the word ‘penalty’ in it extended to any penal consequences whatever, and was not restricted to a pecuniary penalty, and, consequently, that the bankrupt might be convicted and sentenced under the former Act (f).

CANADIAN NOTES.

INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES.

See the Criminal Code, R.S.C. (1906) ch. 146, sec. 2, for the interpretation of words and phrases used therein.

Every provision of the Interpretation Act, (R.S.C. (1906) ch. 1) extends and applies to every Act of the Parliament of Canada except in so far as such provision—

- (a) Is inconsistent with the intent or object of such Act; or
- (b) Would give to any word, expression or clause of any such Act an interpretation inconsistent with the context; or
- (c) Is in any such Act declared not applicable thereto. R.S.C. (1906) ch. 1, sec. 2.

Interpretation of Criminal Statutes.—Penal statutes must be construed strictly, and where an enactment imposes a penalty for a criminal offence, a person against whom it is sought to enforce the penalty is entitled to the benefit of any doubt which may arise in the construction of the enactment. R. v. Wirth, 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 231.

Words and Phrases in Criminal Code.—See 11 Can. Cr. Cas., pp. 375-379; 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 583, 13 Can. Cr. Cas. 541.

The part headings of the Code are to be regarded as preambles to statutes. R. v. Brooks, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 372.

“Bank Note,” a forged paper purporting on the face of it to be a bank note is within the statute, although there be no such bank as named. R. v. Macdonald, 12 U.C.Q.B. 543.

“Everyone” includes bodies corporate unless the context requires otherwise. Union Colliery Company v. The Queen, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 407.

“Capable of being stolen” (in Code sec. 354) includes anything capable of being stolen by anybody, not merely by the accused. R. v. Gildstaub, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 357.

“Person” includes “bodies corporate” and “companies,” but a corporation cannot be indicted for manslaughter. R. v. Great West Laundry Co., 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 5, at p. 519.

“Everyone” is a wider term than “person.” Union Colliery v. The Queen, 4 Can. Cr. Cas., at p. 407.

A small room used for temporary detention of persons is not included in the phrase “a common gaol or prison.” In re Burke (1894), 27 N.S.R. 286.

Valuable Security.—It was formerly held that the term “valuable security” meant a valuable security to the person who parted with it on the false pretence, and that the inducing a person to execute a mortgage on his own property was therefore not obtaining a “valuable security.” R. v. Brady (1866), 26 U.C.Q.B. 13; but the definition in Criminal Code expressly includes any deed, bond, etc., which evidences title.

Defendant was indicted for forging an order for the payment of money, the order being in the following words: “John McLean, tailor, please give M. A. S. (defendant) to the amount of $3.50 and by doing you will oblige me, A. McP.” It was proved that the signature A. McP. was forged by the prisoner, and the prisoner was convicted and sentenced. It was held that this was an order for the payment of money, and not a mere request, and the conviction was affirmed. R. v. Steele (1863), 13 U.C.C.P. 619 (following R. v. Tuke (1858), 17 U.C.Q.B. 296).

The true criterion as to whether a document is an order for payment of money or only a request, is, whether, if the instrument were genuine, and the person to whom it was directed paid it, he could recover the amount from the party by whom the order was given, or charge it to him, for if such be the case it is an order. R. v. Carter, 1 Cox 172; R. v. Ferguson, 1 Cox 241; R. v. Dawson, 3 Cox 220; R. v. Vivian, 1 Den. C.C. 35.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF INDICTABLE OFFENCES.

OFFENCES which may be made the subject of indictment, and are below the crime of treason (w), fall into two classes, felonies and misdeemeanors.

1. Felony—Common Law.—Felony is the common-law term employed to describe the graver crimes known to the common law below the degree of high treason or petty treason (x). The term has long been used to signify the degree or class of crime committed, rather than the penal consequences by way of forfeiture entailed by its commission. But the proper definition at common law appears to be—an offence (triable by indictment only at common law) which occasions a total forfeiture of either lands or goods, or both (y), at the common law; to which capital or other punishment may be superadded according to the degree of guilt (z). Capital punishment is not an essential element in the original definition, but was long so closely associated with felony that until 1827, if a statute made a new offence felony, the law implied that it should be punished not merely by forfeiture, but also by death (a), subject to the right of benefit of clergy (b), unless that were expressly denied by statute (c). This is merely a particular instance of the rule that where a statute describes a new offence as felony, it thereby by necessary consequence gives to the offence the like incidents that belong to a felony by the rules and principles of the common law or general statutory provisions. The chief of these incidents are:

1. Punishment (d).

2. The liability of persons aiding and abetting, committing or (w) Treason (which is only incidentally treated in this work) is sometimes described as a form of felony (see 60 & 61 Vict. c. 18, s. 1); but the procedure for trial of treason is by statute different. See Archbold, Cr. Pl. (23rd ed.) 928; 1 Hawk. c. 17; 2 Stephen, Hist. Crim. Law, 241; Steph. Dig. Cr. Law (6th ed.), arts. 52-62; Parl. Pap. 1878, H. L. (No. 178), Report by Mr. R. S. Wright on Acts relating to Treason. As to piracy, see post, tit. 'Piracy,' p. 255.

(y) These forfeitures were abolished in 1870, except in the case of outlawry: see 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, s. 1.

(z) 4 Bl. Com. 95; and see 1 Hawk. c. 25, s. 1. In Scots law 'the higher crimes, rape, robbery, murder, arson, &c., were called felony, and, being interpreted want of fidelity to his lord, made the vassal lose his fief.' 2 Hume,

App. ii. p. 129. The derivation of 'felony' is uncertain. It is by some traced to the Low Latin fello (Ital. fellone); by others to feah or fie, 'fief or estate,' and lon, 'price or value,' and is by them said to mean pretium feudi. See Spelm. Glos. s.v. 'Felon'; Murray, Dict. Eng. Lang. s.v.; 4 Bl. Com. 95.

(a) 4 Bl. Com. 98. R. v. Johnson, 3 M. & S. 539.

(c) 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 8; post, p. 246, which overrides the common-law presumption in favour of capital punishment (which applied to all felonies except petty larceny and mayhem) by laying down a rule for the punishment of felonies not specifically punishable by other statutes.

(d) Vide post, p. 246. The result of legislation in the nineteenth century has been to make the punishment of every felony depend upon some statute.

procuring the new felony to be convicted as principals in the second degree (e), or accessories before the fact (f).

3. Liability to arrest without warrant.

4. Liability to indictment.

5. The right of peremptory challenge of twenty of the jurors summoned to try the indictment (g).

Felony—Statutes.—No statutory offence is treated as a felony unless it is made so by express words or necessary implication. Not only those crimes which are made felonies by express words in a statute, but also all those which are by statute decreed to have or undergo judgment of life and member become felonies thereby, whether the word 'felony' be omitted or mentioned (h). And a statute which declares that the offender shall, under the particular circumstances, be deemed to have feloniously committed the act, makes the offence a felony, and imposes all the common and ordinary consequences attending a felony (i). So where a statute says that an offence, previously a misdemeanor, 'shall be deemed and construed to be a felony,' instead of declaring it to be a felony in distinct and positive terms, the offence is thereby made a felony (j). An enactment that an offence shall be felony, which was felony at common law, does not create a new offence (k). An offence is not to be made felony by the construction of doubtful and ambiguous words in a statute; and therefore, if it be prohibited under 'pain of forfeiting all that a man has,' or of 'forfeiting body and goods,' or of being 'at the king's will for body, land, and goods,' the offence created is only a misdemeanor (l). Where a statute has made the doing of an act felonious, if a subsequent statute make it penal only, the latter statute is considered as virtually repealing the former, so far as relates to the punishment of the offence (m). Thus, where a statute (9 Geo. I. c. 22) made an offence punishable with death and a subsequent statute (16 Geo. III. c. 30) imposed a forfeiture of £20 for the same offence when first committed, recoverable before justices of the peace, and made the second offence felony, the latter statute was held to be a virtual repeal of the former (n). 'Where a later statute again describes an offence which had been previously created by a former statute, and affixes a different punishment to it, and varies the procedure, or if the later enactment expressly alters the quality of the offence, as by making it a misdemeanor instead of a felony (o), or a felony instead of a misdemeanor (p), the later enactment must be

Where a statute makes a second offence felony, or subject to a heavier punishment than the first, it is always implied that such second offence has been committed after a conviction for the first; and unless this is stated in the indictment, the offence is punishable as a first offence (q).

2. Misdemeanor.—The word misdemeanor is applied to all offences (whether at common law or by statute) which are below the degree of felony, whether they are punishable on indictment or on summary conviction. They may be punished, according to the character of the offence, by fine or imprisonment, or both (r). The word is generally used in contradistinction to felony, and includes such offences as perjury, battery, libel, conspiracy, and public nuisance (s). Misdemeanors have been sometimes termed misprisions: indeed, the word misprision, in its larger sense, is used to signify every considerable misdemeanor which has not a certain name given to it in the law; and it is said that a misprision is contained in every treason or felony whatsoever, and that a person guilty of felony or treason may be proceeded against for a misprision only, if the king please (t).

The term misdemeanor applies not only to completed offences below the degree of felony, but also to attempts (u), or incitements (v), or conspiracies (w) to commit a complete felony or misdemeanor which do not result in the commission of the full offence. An indictment lies at common law for all kinds of inferior crimes of a public nature, as misprisions, and all other contempts (x), all disturbances of the peace, oppressions, or misbehaviour by public officers (y), and all other misdemeanors whatsoever of a public evil example against the common law (z). An indictment will lie for contempt of court by attacking courts of justice or attempting to obstruct the course of justice (a): but it seems doubtful whether every contempt is indictable. In an early case, Holt, C.J., said: 'If a witness be insolent we may commit him for the immediate contempt or bind him to his good behaviour, but we cannot indict him' (b). It seems, however, to be established that whatever openly outrages decency and is injurious to public morals, is a misdemeanor at common law (c). Thus the exposure of a man's person in a public place is indictable (d).

Breach of Statute—Test of Indictability.—In R. v. Hall (e), Charles, J., adopted the rule laid down in 2 Hawk. c. 25, s. 4, that ‘it seems to be a good general ground that wherever a statute prohibits a matter of public grievance to the liberties and security of a subject, or commands a matter of public convenience, as the repairing of the common streets of a town, an offender against such statute is punishable not only at the suit of the party aggrieved, but also by way of indictment for his contempt of the statute, unless such method of proceeding do manifestly appear to be excluded by it’ (f); and the law as laid down in R. v. Hall has been accepted as correct (g).

Where an act or omission, which is not an offence at common law is made punishable by a statute, the questions arise whether the criminal remedies are limited to the particular remedy given by the terms of the statute, or, in other words, whether the remedy given by the statute is exclusive of or alternative to other remedies given by other statutes or the common law. It has been laid down that where an act or omission is not an offence at common law, but is made an offence by statute, an indictment will lie where there is a substantive prohibitory clause in such statute, though there be afterwards a particular provision and a particular remedy given (h). ‘Where a duty is created by statute which affects the public as the public, the proper mode if the duty is not performed is to indict or take the proceedings provided by the statute’ (i). Thus, an unqualified person may be indicted for acting as an attorney contrary to the Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 2, although sect. 35 and sect. 36 enact, that in case ‘any person shall so act he shall be incapable of recovering his fees, and that such offence shall be deemed a contempt of court and punishable accordingly’ (j). And a clerk to borough justices has been held liable to indictment for being interested in the prosecution of offenders committed by borough justices, as he was not liable to the particular penalty prescribed by sect. 102 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76) (k). When a new offence is created by statute, and a penalty is annexed to it by a separate and substantive clause, it is not necessary for the prosecutor to sue for the penalty; but he may proceed on the prior clause, on the ground of its being a misdemeanor (l). And wherever a statute forbids the doing of a thing,

(l) R. v. Harris, 4 T. R. 205, Ashhurst, J. And this principle has been held to apply where the clause annexing the penalty was in the same section of the statute. Thus 5 Eliz. c. 4, s. 31 (rep.) enacted, ‘that it shall not be lawful to any person to set up, &c., any craft, mystery, &c., except he shall have been brought up therein seven years as an apprentice,’ &c., upon pain that every person willingly offending or doing the contrary forfeit for every default forty shillings for every month; and the method of proceeding upon this statute was either by information qui tam in the court of oyer and terminer or sessions of the county, &c., where the offence was committed, to recover the penalty, or by indictment in those courts. But it should be observed that a subsequent section (39) gave authority to proceed by indictment, or by information, &c. See the cases collected in the note to the doing it wilfully, although without any corrupt motive, is indictable (m). Thus, under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15 (rep.), which made it a misdemeanor if any person 'shall wilfully do, or cause to be done, anything in such a manner as to obstruct any engine or carriage using any railway, Maule, J., held, that if a person designedly placed on a railway substances having a tendency to produce an obstruction, he was within the Act, and that it was not necessary that he should have placed them there expressly with the view to obstruct an engine (n). It has also been ruled that if a statute enjoins an act to be done, without pointing out any mode of punishment, an indictment lies for disobeying the injunction of the Legislature (o). Thus, the father of a child was indictable if, being requested by the registrar within forty-two days of its birth so to do, he wilfully refused to inform the registrar of the particulars required by the Act to be registered touching the birth, contrary to sect. 20 of the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 86) (p). And the remedy by indictment in such a case is not taken away by a subsequent statute pointing out a particular mode of punishment for such disobedience (q). Where the same statute which enjoins an act to be done contains also an enactment providing for a particular mode of proceeding, as commitment, in case of neglect or refusal, it has been doubted whether an indictment will lie (r). But 'all that the authorities establish' on this point is that where there is a substantial general prohibition or command in one clause and there is a subsequent clause which prescribes a specific remedy, the remedy by indictment is not excluded (s). Where a statute only adds a further penalty to an offence prohibited by the common law, the offender may still be indicted at the common law (t); and if a statute gives a new punishment or new mode of proceeding for what before was a misdemeanor, without altering the class or character of the offence, the new punishment or new mode of proceeding is alternative only, and the offender may be proceeded against as before for the common-law misdemeanor (see sect. 33 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, ante, pp. 4 & 6).

Therefore, notwithstanding the provisions of the Blasphemy Act, 1697 (9 & 10 Will. III. c. 35; Ruffhead, c. 32), it was held that a blasphemous libel might be prosecuted at common law (u). Where a statute makes that felony which before was a misdemeanor only, the misdemeanor is merged, and there can be no prosecution afterwards for the misdemeanor (v).

It is an offence at common law to obstruct the execution of powers granted by statute (w). But where a public Act merely regulates private rights, an indictment will not lie for the infringement of those rights: as, if a statute empowers the setting out of private roads and the directing their repairs, an indictment does not lie for not repairing them (x).

Disobedience of the orders of a competent tribunal is in most cases an indictable misdemeanor at common law (y), and where a statute empowered the King in Council to make an order as to quarantine, and did not annex any specific punishment for disobedience, the disobedience was held to be a misdemeanor indictable at common law (z). By the 'Epping Forest Amendment Act, 1872,' s. 5, the Epping Forest commissioners may make orders prohibiting, until after their final report, any inclosure or waste of land within the forest, subject, in their judgment, to any forestal or common rights. The commissioners made a general order prohibiting all persons from committing waste upon a piece of land described until the final report, or until further order; all persons affected to be at liberty to apply to them as there might be occasion. The defendant applied to the commissioners by counsel as a person affected, but they refused to enter into the question raised. The defendant was convicted upon an indictment for breach of this order, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, which held that the order and indictment were good (a).

In the case of acts commanded or prohibited by statute, three questions arise: whether the statute intended the remedy to be (1) by indictment, or (2) by civil proceedings, or (3) by some or other specified exclusive or alternative statutory remedy. As to certain classes of acts commanded or forbidden by statute in the public interest, the question arises whether the remedy by indictment is excluded by a particular remedy given by the statute, or is cumulative upon the statutory remedy (b). The true rule is stated to be this: 'Where the offence was punishable by a common-law proceeding, before the making of such statute prescribing a particular mode of punishing it, then either method may be pursued, as the particular remedy is cumulative, and does not exclude the common-law punishment; but where the statute creates a new offence by prohibiting and making unlawful anything which was lawful before, and appoints a particular remedy against such new offence by a particular sanction and particular method of proceeding, such method of proceeding must be pursued and no other (c). The mention of other methods of proceeding impliedly excludes that of indictment (d); unless such methods of proceeding are given by a separate and substantive clause (e). Thus it is now settled (f), that where a statute making a new offence, not prohibited by the common law, appoints in the same clause a particular manner of proceeding against the offender, as by commitment or action of debt or information, without mentioning an indictment, no indictment can be maintained (g). It was decided on 21 Hen. VIII. c. 13, s. 1, which provides that no spiritual person shall take land to farm on pain to forfeit £10 per month; that as the clause prohibiting the act specified the punishment, the defendant was not liable to be indicted (h). And it was held not to be an indictable offence to keep an ale-house without a licence, because a particular punishment, namely, commitment by two justices, was provided by the statute (i). And an indictment for assaulting and beating a custom-house officer in the execution of his office was quashed, because 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 11, s. 6, appointed a particular mode of punishment for that offence (j). So an indictment will not lie against an overseer for wilful breaches of the duties imposed upon him by the Registration of Electors Act, 1843, in preparing and publishing voters' lists, inasmuch as the sections prescribing those duties contain no general prohibitory clause, and sect. 51 gives the revising barrister power to fine overseers for wilful breaches of duty, and sect. 97 gives the party aggrieved the right to bring a penal action against the overseer for every wilful misfeasance or wilful act of commission or omission contrary to the Act (k).

Matters not indictable at Common Law.—An indictment will not lie in respect of injuries of a private nature to individuals unless they in some way concern the King (l), or are accompanied by acts amounting to a breach of the peace (m). Thus an indictment did not lie for excluding commoners from a common by enclosing (n), or for infringing the rights of the inhabitants of a particular district (o), nor for acting, not

Haynes, 4 M. & S. 214, an indictment was found against a miller, for receiving good barley to grind at his mill, and delivering a mixture of oat and barley meal, different from the produce of the barley, and which was musty and unwholesome. For the prosecution was cited a note in 1 Hawk. c. 71, s. 1, referring to R. v. Wood [1740], 2 Sess. Cas. K.B. (2nd ed.) p. 277, where it is laid down, that changing corn by a miller, and returning bad corn instead of it, is punishable by indictment; for, being in the way of trade, it is deemed an offence against the public: but it was held that the indictment would not lie. Ellenborough, C.J., in giving judgment, said, that if the allegation had been that the miller delivered the mixture as an article for the food of man, it might possibly have sustained the indictment, but that he could not say that its being musty and unwholesome necessarily and ex vi termini imported, that it was for the food of man; and it was not stated that it was to be used for the sustentation of man, but only that it was a mixture of oat and barley meal. He added: 'As to the other point, that this is not an indictable offence, because it respects a matter transacted in the course of trade, and where no tokens were exhibited by which the party acquired any greater degree of credit, if the case had been that this miller was owner of a soke-mill, to which the inhabitants of the vicinage were bound to resort, in order to get their corn ground, and that the miller, abusing the confidence of this his situation, had made it a colour for practising a fraud, this might have presented a different aspect; but as it now is, it seems to be no more than the case of a common tradesman, who is guilty of a fraud in a matter of trade or dealing; such as is adverted to in R. v. Wheatley, and the other cases, as not being indictable.' And see also R. v. Bower, 1 Cowp. 323, as to the point that for an imposition, which a man's own prudence ought to guard him against, an indictment does not lie, but he is left to his civil remedy. But in R. v. Dixon, 3 M. & S. 11, it was held, that a baker who sells bread containing alum, in a shape which renders it noxious, is guilty of an indictable offence, if he ordered the alum to be introduced into the bread, although he gave directions for mixing it up in the manner which would have rendered it harmless.

or walk, unlawfully did abandon the said child in the said parish without having provided any means for the support of the said child, the said child not being settled in the said parish, was held bad, because the mere abandonment, the possible consequence of which might be to injure the parish, was not indictable (x).

Where an indictment stated that the prisoner intending to burthen the inhabitants of a parish with the maintenance of her bastard child abandoned the said child in the said parish, and it appeared that the prisoner left the child in a dry ditch in a field in the parish; there was a pathway in the field by the ditch, and a lane separated from the ditch by a hedge neither of which was much frequented; Parke, B., held that there was no ground for imputing any intention to burthen the parish, as it was not placed in a position where it was likely to come to the knowledge of the officers of the parish (y).

The administration of a poisonous ingredient with intent to hurt and damage the body of another, whereby sickness and disorder of his body is caused, was not indictable at common law (z), but such an act is punishable under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 24 (post, Bk ix. c. iv.).

Cases of non-feasance and particular wrong done to another are not in general the subject of indictment; and it has been doubted whether a clergyman is indictable for refusing to marry persons who were lawfully entitled to be married (a); but circumstances may exist of mere non-feasance towards a bedridden or helpless person or a child of tender years (such as the neglect or refusal to provide sufficient food and sustenance for such person being under the charge of the accused), which may amount to an indictable offence at common law if death or serious injury to health results from the neglect (b).

Where a mayor of a city, being a justice, made an order that a company in the city should admit one to be a freeman of that corporation, and the master of the company, being served with the order, refused to obey it, such refusal was not the subject of indictment (c). And an indictment will not lie for not curing a person of a disease according to promise, for it is not a public offence, and no more in effect than a ground for an action (d). To keep an open shop in a city, not being free of the city, contrary to the immemorial custom there, has been held not to be indictable (e).

Trespasses.—A mere act of trespass (such as entering a yard and digging the ground, and erecting a shed or cutting a stable) committed by one person, unaccompanied by any circumstances constituting a breach of the peace, is not indictable (f). And an indictment was held not to lie against one person for pulling off the thatch from the house of another, who was in peaceable possession (g). An indictment for taking away chattels will not lie unless it states or imports that such a degree of force was used as made the taking an offence against the public. Where an indictment averred that the defendant with force and arms unlawfully, forcibly, and injuriously seized, took, and carried away, of and from J. S., and against his will, a paper-writing purporting to be a warrant to apprehend the defendant for forgery, Perryn, B., held that the indictment was not valid, as it charged nothing but a mere private trespass, and neither the King nor the public appeared to have any interest therein (h).

But where an indictment stated the entering a dwelling-house, and vi et armis and with strong hand turning out the prosecutor, the Court refused to quash it (i). And an indictment will lie for taking goods forcibly, if such taking is proved to be a breach of the peace (j): and though such goods are the prosecutor's own property, yet, if he takes them in that manner, he will be guilty (k).

Besides the common-law remedy by indictment for treason, felony, or misdemeanor, there are also the following other remedies:—

Coroner's Inquisition.—An inquisition taken by a coroner and his jury charging wilful murder or manslaughter (l), or concealment of treasure trove (m), is equivalent to an indictment for such offence.

Criminal Information.—Misdemeanors (but not treasons or felonies) may be prosecuted in the High Court of Justice without the intervention of a grand jury, on information filed ex officio by the Attorney-General (n), or on information filed by the King's Coroner and Attorney by leave of the Court (o). This remedy is now regarded as extraordinary, and is rarely used (p). The procedure is regulated by the Crown Office Rules, 1906, rr. 35–39, 79, 83, 84.

Summary Proceedings.—In the case of a very large number of offences newly created by statute the sole criminal remedy is by proceedings for a summary conviction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1848 to 1899, as amended by the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67): and there is also much legislation giving power to convict summarily of certain forms of offence, particularly public nuisances, which at common law are punishable only on indictment. The power to convict summarily of the latter class of offence is alternative to and not exclusive of the power to indict (q).

Election to be tried on Indictment.—By the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 17, subs. 1, 'A person when charged before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction with an offence in respect of the commission of which an offender is liable on summary conviction to be imprisoned for a term exceeding three months (r), and which is not an assault, may, on appearing before the Court and before the charge is gone into, but not afterwards, claim to be tried by a jury, and thereupon . . . the offence shall as respects the person so charged be deemed to be an indictable offence, and if the person so charged is committed for trial or bailed to appear for trial, shall be prosecuted accordingly . . . ' (s).

Similar provisions are made by two earlier Acts: the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 9; and the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 77), s. 15: and by sect. 1 (6) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), 'Any person charged with an offence under this section (relating to false trade marks and false trade descriptions) before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction shall, on appearing before the Court, and before the charge is gone into, be informed of his right to be tried on indictment, and if he requires be so tried accordingly' (t). As to summary trial of corrupt or illegal practices at elections see 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 43.

The offences to which sect. 17 applies are too numerous for enumeration here, and, so far as material, are mentioned under the appropriate titles, post (u). By subsect. 2, as interpreted by the judges, the justices must inform the accused of his election, so soon as it appears that by reason of a previous conviction or otherwise the accused is liable to more than three months' imprisonment, and, if they do not, the summary conviction is void (v). By subsect. 3, as amended in 1908, the section is not to apply to the case of a child under fourteen, unless the parent or guardian of the child is present. If the parent, etc., is present, the inquiry as to election is made of him, and the election is made by him (w).

Where an accused person elects, under sect. 17, to be tried by a jury, the subsequent procedure before justices is the same as that which is applicable to the case of indictable offences, and not that applicable to summary proceedings. The accused person may therefore be committed to take his trial in respect of any indictable offence disclosed by the depositions, and, in cases not falling within the Vexatious Indictments Acts, counts may be added to the indictment in respect of any indictable offence disclosed by the depositions, although the accused was not summoned before the justices in respect of such offence (x). The indictment need not include any reference to the election (y), but where the offence is punishable by more than three months' imprisonment by reason of a previous conviction, the previous conviction is charged in the indictment in the same manner as in ordinary indictable cases. But the previous conviction may not be proved until after conviction of the subsequent offence, unless its proof is essential to the proof of the complete or subsequent offence (z).

CANADIAN NOTES.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES.

Felony and Misdemeanour.—The distinction between “felony” and “misdemeanour” is abolished. Code sec. 14.

Misdemeanour Practice to Prevail.—When a certain practice would have been permissible in case of misdemeanour, and not in case of felony, the practice has been to apply the rule as in cases of misdemeanour, and such is the intention of the Code. R. v. Fox, 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 457.

Prisoner's Testimony as Witness at Another Trial.—Consent of prisoner's counsel. The distinction between felony and misdemeanour having been abolished, the consent of counsel for the accused which before the Code would have been effective in misdemeanours only, is now effective, although the offence charged was formerly a felony. And evidence given on the trial of another person including the evidence of the prisoner then called as a witness, may with the consent of the prisoner's counsel be admitted in evidence both for and against the prisoner. R. v. Fox, 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 457 (Ont.)

Felony or Misdemeanour.—A person committed for trial for an indictable offence which was a felony before the Code is not entitled as of right to bail. For indictable offences which were misdemeanours before the Code the accused committed for trial is entitled to bail as a matter of right. Ex parte Fortier, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 191.

A provincial statute prior to Confederation, providing for the discharge from imprisonment in default of indictment of an accused person committed for a “felony” will apply equally to cases which were misdemeanours before the abolition of the distinction between felony and misdemeanour. Enactments regulating the procedure in Courts are usually deemed imperative, and not merely directory. R. v. Riel (No. 2) (1885), 1 Terr. L.R. 23, 44.

Coroner's Inquisition.—No one shall be tried on any coroner's inquisition. Code sec. 940.

Upon a verdict of guilty being found before him, it is the duty of a coroner to direct by warrant that a person charged with manslaughter or murder shall be taken into custody, and conveyed before a magistrate or justice; or the coroner may direct that the accused enter into recognizances, with or without bail, to appear before a magistrate or justice. Code sec. 667.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF CRIMINAL JURISDICTION.

It is necessary to distinguish between national or territorial jurisdiction to try for crime, and venue, i.e. the proper district of England from which the jury must be summoned to try a crime which is within the jurisdiction of the English Courts (a). Consequently, this chapter necessarily to some extent includes procedure as well as jurisdiction.

In the view of English law, crime is primarily local, i.e., depends on the law of the place in which it is committed, and not on the nationality of the person who commits it (b). On this principle aliens are amenable to the English criminal law, in respect of crimes committed in England (c), and British subjects are not amenable to that law in respect of offences committed outside England, unless committed within the Admiralty jurisdiction, or unless specially provided for by statute.

At common law the jurisdiction of English Courts to try persons accused of crime is regulated by the following rules:—

1. Courts of the common law could try only offences committed within the body of the realm. Offences committed by Englishmen outside the body of the realm were cognisable, if at all, only by the admiral or by the constable and marshal.
2. Indictments for crimes committed within the realm could be found and tried only by juries summoned from the county, liberty, borough, or other judicial area within which the crime or an integral part of it was alleged to have been committed (d). This rule created difficulties in the administration of justice where the acts constituting the crime were not all committed within the same judicial district. As regards larceny, this difficulty was got over by treating common law larceny as committing in any county in England into which the thief carried the stolen goods (e). As regards homicide, cases in which the fatal wound was given in one county and the death took place in another, were met by legislation, 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 24, s. 2, under which the trial was to be in the county where the death occurred.

It seems to have been established as a common-law rule that a misdemeanor committed partly in one county and partly in another could be tried in either county (f). 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 24, s. 2, was repealed in 1826 (g), and the following general rules were applied both to felonies and misdemeanors: 'For the more effectual prosecution of offences committed near the boundaries of counties, or partly in one county and partly in another, it is enacted by the Criminal Law Act, 1826 (7 Geo. IV. c. 64), s. 12, "that where any felony or misdemeanor shall be committed on the boundary or boundaries of two or more counties, or within the distance of five hundred yards of any such boundary or boundaries (h), or shall be begun in one county and completed in another, every such felony or misdemeanor may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined and punished in any of the said counties, in the same manner as if it had been actually and wholly committed therein"' (i).

The term 'county' (j) in these enactments includes not only counties at large, but counties of cities or towns (k), but does not include limited jurisdiction within counties (l). The section does not apply to offences partly committed on the high seas or on land outside England (m). The effect of the section is to put an end to conflicts of jurisdiction between two counties in cases to which the section applies. It authorises the laying and trial of the offence in either county (n), but not laying the offence in one county and trying it in the other (o).

Offences committed on a Journey or Voyage.—By the Criminal Law Act, 1826 (7 Geo. IV. c. 64), s. 13: 'Where any felony or misdemeanor shall be committed on any person, or on or in respect of any property in or upon any coach, waggon, cart, or other carriage whatever employed in any journey, or shall be committed on any person, or on or in respect of any property on board any vessel whatever employed on any voyage or journey upon any navigable river, canal, or inland navigation, such felony or misdemeanor may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in any county, through any part whereof such coach, waggon, cart, carriage, or vessel shall have passed, in the course of the

Upon an indictment for manslaughter, found by the grand jury of the county of the city of W., alleging the blow which caused the death to have been struck in the county of Worcester, it was objected that the words, 'began in one county and completed in another,' did not apply to such a case, as the word 'completed' necessarily imported some cative and continuing agency in the person committing the offence in the county where the felony was completed; but it was held that the section extended to the case. The clerk of arraigns had consulted Littledale, J., who thought that the indictment ought to be preferred in the city, and it had been so preferred accordingly. C. S. G.

journey or voyage during which such felony or misdemeanor shall have been committed, in the same manner as if it had been actually committed in such county; and in all cases where the side, centre, or other part of any highway, or the side, bank, centre, or other part of any such river, canal, or navigation shall constitute the boundary of any two counties, such felony or misdemeanor may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either of the said counties, through or adjoining to, or by the boundary of any part whereof such coach, waggon, cart, carriage, or vessel shall have passed, in the course of the journey or voyage, during which such felony or misdemeanor shall have been committed, in the same manner as if it had been actually committed in such county' (p).

This enactment is general, and applies to any carriage whatever employed in any journey (q). Where the prisoners were tried for larceny of oats, &c., the property of their masters, it appeared that they had been sent with a waggon from a railway station, then in Middlesex, to Woolwich, then in Kent, that the usual quantity of oats for the horses was given out to them, and put into the waggon in nosebags, and that the prisoners sold the oats at Woolwich. It was held that they were triable in Middlesex; for the 'object of the statute was to enable a prosecutor, whose property is stolen from any carriage on a journey, to prosecute in any county through any part of which the carriage shall have passed in the course of that journey; because, in many cases, it might be quite impossible to ascertain at what part of the journey the offence was actually committed' (r).

The prisoner had acted as guard of a coach from P. in Cumberland to K. in Westmoreland, and was entrusted with a banker's parcel containing bank-notes and two sovereigns; on changing horses in Westmoreland, he carried the parcel to a privy, and while there took out of it the sovereigns. Parke, B., held that as the act of stealing was not 'in or upon the coach,' the case was not within the statute, and that the felony having been committed in Westmoreland, the indictment ought to be preferred in that county (s).

The prosecutor missed a dressing-case which had been in a railway carriage with him. The prisoner had accompanied the train, and had stated that he had found the dressing-case in a first-class carriage at a station in Staffordshire, and that he carried it to the engine and gave it to another prisoner, who opened it with a wrench, and on their return to Shrewsbury gave him some of the articles as his share. It was argued that the prisoner's statement showed that the larceny was not committed during the journey; for the removal of the dressing-case from the carriage did not constitute the larceny, according to the prisoner's statement, but it consisted in the distribution of the property at Shrewsbury; but Williams, J., held that there was evidence from which the jury might find that the dressing-case was abstracted during the journey; as the evidence, with the exception of the prisoner's statement, was consistent with either supposition (t).

Where on a trial at the Central Criminal Court for assault, it appeared that the prosecutrix and the defendant left Brighton together by a train which ran to New Cross, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court; and the assault was committed in Sussex, and the prosecutrix at Three Bridges left the carriage in which she had been previously riding with the defendant, and travelled in another carriage to New Cross (u); it was held that by the combined operation of sect. 13 (v), and the Central Criminal Court Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 36) (w), the case might be tried at the Central Criminal Court. There was but one journey, and although the carriages were distinct, they all formed but one conveyance, and the fact that the prosecutrix and defendant rode in different carriages after the assault did not affect the question; it was the same as if they had occupied different parts of the same carriage. The words 'through which any carriage shall have passed' in sect. 13, refer to the time of the trial, and not to a time antecedent to the commitment of the offence, and therefore make the offence triable at any place within the limits of the beginning and end of the journey, and do not confine the trial to any county through which the train had passed up to the time of the offence (x).

In the enactments above set forth, the term 'county' referred to the geographical counties as then existing (including counties of cities or towns). The boundaries of most, if not all, counties in England have since 1826 been altered for administrative purposes and for Parliamentary elections. The effect of these changes upon the judicial county may be stated thus:

The changes of area effected by the Parliamentary Boundaries Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 64) (y), and the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76) (z), had the effect of removing completely from one county to another, for all purposes, the transferred areas (a). Where the prisoner was indicted for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, at a place which was added to the borough of Haverfordwest (b), by the Acts last above mentioned, and declared to be part of the borough, it was held that the prisoner might be tried by a jury of the borough (c).

shall be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace acting for any county, to act as a justice or justices of the peace in all things whatsoever concerning or in any wise relating to any detached part of any other county (d), which is surrounded in whole or in part by the county for which such justice or justices acts or act; and that all acts of such justice or justices of the peace, and of any constable or other officer in obedience thereto, shall be as good, and all offenders in such detached part may be committed for trial, tried, convicted and sentenced, and judgment and execution may be had upon them in like manner as if such detached parts were to all intents and purposes part of the county for which such justice or justices acts or act; and all constables and other officers of such detached parts are hereby required to obey the warrants, orders, and acts of such justice or justices, and to perform their several duties in respect thereof, under the pains and penalties to which any constable or other officer may be liable for a neglect of duty' (e).

By sect. 3: 'The word "county" shall be taken to mean and include county, riding, division, and parts of a county having a separate commission of the peace' (f).

The grand jury of the county, which wholly surrounds a detached part of another county, may find an indictment for an offence committed in such detached part, and the prisoner may be tried by a jury of such surrounding county. The prisoner was indicted at the Dorsetshire assizes for larceny in a parish of Somersetshire, entirely detached from it, and surrounded by Dorsetshire. He had been committed by a Dorsetshire magistrate to the gaol of that county. The indictment laid the offence to have been committed in the parish of H., the same being a detached part of Somersetshire, surrounded in the whole by Dorsetshire; the venue in the margin was Dorset. The indictment did not state that the prisoner was in Dorsetshire, or that he was committed by a Dorsetshire magistrate. Fitzherbert objected, first, that this should have appeared on the face of the indictment; and, secondly, that the grand jury of Dorsetshire could not find the bill, as there were no words in the statute giving any power to find the bill; but Rolfe, B., overruled the objection, saying that it would strike the Act out of the statute-book (g).

(d) For the purposes of county police, these detached parts and all liberties and franchises (except municipal boroughs having a separate police force) are treated as part of the surrounding county. 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93, s. 27. That Act does not apply to the Metropolitan Police district (s. 28).

(e) This Act was declared by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 68, s. 2 (rep. S. L. R. 1892), to extend to parts of a county which did not form part of the county before the passing of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, in like manner as if they had always formed part of the county.

(f) Sect. 2, which provides for payment of expenses of prosecutions by the county to which the detached part belongs, seems to be superseded by 8 Edw. VII. c. 15, post, Bk. xii. c. v. tit. 'Costs.'

Q.S. 188, where a quare is added to the decision by the learned editor; but with all respect to his opinion, it would seem that the decision is perfectly correct, as the object of the Act clearly was to render prisoners triable in the surrounding county, and to prevent expense, and the effect of a contrary decision would be that they never could be so tried in such county, except where an indictment had been found by a grand jury of the county to which the detached part belonged; which would greatly add both to the inconvenience and expense, which it was intended to avoid. It is difficult also to see how it can be correctly said that a person is 'tried in like manner as if such detached part

By the County Police Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 88), s. 2: 'It shall be lawful for the justices of any two or more neighbouring counties in their several general or quarter sessions assembled, from time to time to agree that such parts of their several counties as to them shall seem fit, shall, for the purposes of the County Police Act, 1839, be considered as forming part of any other of the said counties; and whenever any such district shall be so transferred, for the purpose of the said Act, from one county to another, with the consent of the justices of both the last-mentioned counties, such district shall be considered, for the purposes of the said Act, as if it were detached from the county to which it belongs, and wholly surrounded by the county to which it is so transferred, and all the provisions contained herein, or in the said Act, or in the Counties (Detached Parts) Act, 1839 (supra), shall be taken to apply to such transferred districts' (h).

By an Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. 101), it was declared that every part of a county in England and Wales which is detached from the main body of the county should be considered as forming, for all purposes, part of the County in which it was included for Parliamentary elections, under the Parliamentary Boundary Act, 1832. This Act was repealed as spent in 1891 (S. L. R.) (i), but the repeal does not affect its past operation (j).

By the Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), s. 7 (which is incorporated into the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 6 (k): 'The acts of any justice or justices, and of any constable or officer in obedience thereto, shall be as good in relation to any detached part of any county which is surrounded in whole or in part by the county for which such justice or justices acts or act, as if the same were to all intents and purposes part of the said county.'

By the Liberties Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 105), provision was made for the union for judicial and other purposes of liberties with the counties in which they lie, and all liberties seem now to have been merged except those of Ripon, and the Soke of Peterborough, and the Isle of Ely.

The readjustment of county boundaries, with the exceptions above stated, has been effected by statutes confirming provisional orders. The Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), after providing for the readjustment of county boundaries for administrative purposes, provides, by sect. 59 (2): 'that a place which is part of an administrative county for the purposes of the Act shall, subject as in this Act mentioned, form part of that county for all purposes, whether sheriff, lieutenant, custos rotulorum, justices, militia, coroner, or other' (l). This enactment does were to all intents and purposes part of the county for which such justice acts,' unless he is tried on an indictment found by the grand jury of such county; for that is the mode in which he would be tried if the part were to all intents part of that county. C. S. G.

not expressly refer to assizes. The corresponding provision of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 37), s. 69, makes express reference to assizes, quarter or petty sessions, and jurors, and an Order in Council has been made adjusting the assizes to the counties as bounded under the Act of 1898.

In England the jurisdiction of courts of assize depends on the commission, and in the case of winter and spring assizes on the Orders in Council issued under the Winter and Spring Assizes Acts (m).

Counties of Cities.—Besides the geographical counties at large which exist for judicial as distinct from administrative purposes (n), the following cities and boroughs are counties in themselves (o): Berwick-on-Tweed, Bristol,* Caermarthen,* Canterbury, Chester, Exeter,* Gloucester, Haverfordwest,* Kingston-upon-Hull, Lichfield, Lincoln,* London City, Newcastle-upon-Tyne,* Norwich,* Nottingham,* Poole, Southampton, Worcester,* and York.* All these cities, &c., have separate quarter sessions; but at present separate assizes are held only for those marked with an asterisk.

Until 1798 there was an exclusive right that offences arising within the county of a city or town corporate should be tried by a jury of persons residing within the limits of the city or town. By the Counties of Cities Act, 1798 (38 Geo. III. c. 52), provision was made for indicting and trying in the adjoining county at large, persons accused of committing offences in the county of any city or town corporate except the City of London (ss. 2, 3, 10), or for transferring for trial at the assizes of the county at large, indictments found in the county of a city or town (s. 4) (p).

By the Criminal Law Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 55), s. 19: 'Whenever any justice or justices of the peace, or coroner, acting for any county of a city or county of a town corporate within which His Majesty has not been pleased for five years next before the passing of this Act to direct a commission of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery to be executed, and until His Majesty shall be pleased to direct a commission of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery to be executed within the same, shall commit for safe custody to the gaol or house of correction of such county of a city or town any person charged with any offence committed within the limits of such county of a city or town not triable at the court of quarter sessions of the said county of a city or county of a town, the commitment shall specify that such person is committed pursuant to this Act, and the recognisances to appear to prosecute and give evidence taken by such justice, justices, or coroner shall in all such cases be conditioned for appearance, prosecution, and giving evidence at the court of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery for the next adjoining county (q); and

By the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 188 and sched. 6 (s): 'The next adjoining county (for purposes of criminal trials) to Berwick-on-Tweed and Newcastle-upon-Tyne is Northumberland; to Bristol, Gloucester; to Chester, Cheshire; to Exeter, Devon; and to Kingston-upon-Hull, Yorkshire.'

Transitory Offences.—Certain offences wholly committed within the realm, are, for purposes of venue and trial, treated as not being local but transitory, i.e. the offender may be tried wherever he is found, apprehended, or in custody. The only offence which is transitory at common law seems to be larceny (t). Offences committed partly in one judicial district and partly in another, are triable in either, at common law or under 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, ss. 12, 13, (ante p. 20). Certain offences are, by statute, triable wherever the accused is found, or is apprehended, or is in custody, e.g. bigamy and forgery (u), and post-office offences (v).

Offences on Land outside England.—Apart from statute, existing English Courts (w) cannot take cognisance of any crime committed on land outside England, whether by a British subject (x), or an alien.

(r) The venue in the margin of an indictment was 'county of Norfolk, being the next adjoining county to the borough of Yarmouth'; the offence was committed in the parish of Gorleston, in Suffolk. The whole of that parish is within the jurisdiction of the borough of Great Yarmouth, and the prisoner had been committed by the borough magistrates to the house of correction at Great Yarmouth. It was objected that the prisoner could not be tried in Norfolk. Pollock, C.B.: 'The words of the statute are, that in such a case as this the prisoner shall be tried "in the next adjoining county." Here the next adjoining county was either Norfolk or Suffolk. The place in the borough where the offence was committed has nothing to do with it. This would very likely have been a good trial in Suffolk, but I think that it is also a good trial in Norfolk.' R. v. Gallant, 1 F. & F. 517. It does not appear in the report whether Yarmouth was a county of a town, and it is submitted that the decision is based on a misreading of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 19.

Statutory authority has been given for the trial in England of the following offences committed outside England:—Treason and misprision of treason (y); murder or manslaughter on land out of the United Kingdom by a British subject (z); offences against the Dockyards Protection Act, 1772 (12 Geo. III. c. 24, s. 2); the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870 (a); the Explosive Substances Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 3, s. 7); the Official Secrets Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 52, s. 6), the Commissioners of Oaths Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 10, s. 9); the Foreign Marriage Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 23, s. 15); and bigamy by a British subject outside England and Ireland (b).

It would seem that no foreigner can be liable to trial or punishment under British law for any offence committed by him on land outside the dominions or protectorates of the Crown, even though the act committed by him takes effect in British territory (c). To these there may be one exception, in the case of an offence ashore by a foreigner who is one of the crew of a British merchant ship (d). But this has been doubted in R. v. Anderson (e).

Homicide.—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 9: ‘Where any murder or manslaughter shall be committed on land out of the United Kingdom, whether within the King’s dominions or without, and whether the person killed were a subject of [His] Majesty or not (f), every offence committed by any subject of [His] Majesty, in respect of any such case, whether the same shall amount to the offence of murder or of manslaughter, or of being accessory to murder or manslaughter, may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in any county or place in England or Ireland in which such person shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if such offence had been actually committed in that county or place; provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent any person from being tried in any place out of England or Ireland for any murder or manslaughter committed out of England or Ireland, in the same manner as such person might have been tried before the passing of this Act’ (g).

(g) Framed from 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7 (E), and 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 10 (I). By 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7, any person charged with any offence specified in the present enactment might be examined and committed by any justice of the place where the person so charged was, and thereupon a special commission was to be issued for the trial of such person. By 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 10, where any person was charged in Ireland with any offence specified in the present enactment, he might be examined and committed by any justice of the place where the person so charged was, and thereupon he might be tried in that place in the same manner as if his offence had been there committed. This was a much better provision than that in 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7, as it got rid of the necessity for a special Though 33 Hen. VIII. c. 23 (rep.) was not limited to offences committed within the King's dominions, yet it was held that it did not apply to a case where a prisoner of war had taken service on board an English merchant ship, and whilst in that capacity had killed an Englishman in a foreign country, on the ground that he could not be deemed a British subject. The offender, a Spaniard, was taken prisoner at sea, and whilst abroad, volunteered on board an Indiaman, and received the usual bounty and part of his pay for about three months, which he served on board the Indiaman. While the Indiaman was lying in the Canton river, about a third of a mile in width, within the tideway, at the distance of about eighty miles from the sea, the prisoner went ashore with the deceased, an Englishman, and there mortally wounded the deceased, who was carried on board ship, and died there the next day. Upon a case reserved, it was argued that the prisoner was not liable to be tried here, because he never became subject to the laws of this country; that he was not so by birth, and did not become so by entering on board the Indiaman. No judgment was given, but the prisoner was discharged (h).

An indictment charged, in substance, that the prisoner, at Lisbon, in the kingdom of Portugal, in parts beyond the seas without England, one H. G., in the peace of God and our lord the King, then and there being, feloniously did assault, shoot, and murder, against the peace of our said lord the King. It was held that the offence was triable in England, though committed in a foreign country, the prisoner and the deceased being both British subjects at the time; and that stating H. G. to be in the King's peace at the time, sufficiently imported that he was the King's subject at the time; and that the statement that this was against the King's peace, sufficiently imported that the prisoner was also a subject of this realm at that time (i). In R. v.

commission, and avoided a difficulty which was very likely to arise under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7; for the special commission issued under that section recited the offence charged before the justice, and authorised the trial for that offence, and a fatal variance might well arise on the trial between the facts proved and the offence charged before the justice. The present section is substantially the same as 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 10, but uses the terms of 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 8, and under it the party charged may be examined before any justice of the place where he is, and tried in the same place. The words 'dealt with' apply to justices of the peace; 'inquired of' to the grand jury; 'tried' to the petit jury; and 'determined and punished' to the Court; as was held by Parke, B., in R. v. Ruck, 2 Russ. Cr. & M. (4th ed.), p. 50, MSS. C. S. G., post, vol. ii. p. 1098. 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7 (E.), and 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 10 (I), were confined to accessories after the fact in manslaughter, but the present section is so framed as to include an accessory before the fact in that offence, wherever there can be such an accessory, as to which see post, 'Manslaughter.' This section was carefully framed in order to remove any question as to the killing of a foreigner being within it; and instead of the words of 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7, 'where any of His Majesty's subjects shall be charged in England with any murder or manslaughter, or with being accessory before the fact to any murder, &c. (which, from their collocation, might afford an argument that no murder was within the clause unless it were committed by a British subject, and therefore a British subject would not be within it if he were accessory to a murder by an alien), the wording of this clause has been adopted so as to include an accessory to any murder by whomsoever committed. (h) R. v. Depardo, 1 Taunt. 26; R. & R. 134. According to the report in R. & R., the indictment was for manslaughter. Helsham (j), it was ruled that an indictment upon 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7 (k), must aver, that the prisoner and deceased were subjects of His Majesty, but that the declarations of the prisoner were evidence to go to the jury to prove this fact. The indictment charged the murder to have been committed 'at Boulogne, in the kingdom of France, to wit, at the parish of St. Mary-le-bow, in the ward of Cheap,' &c. The grand jury objected to finding the bill, as it stated the death to have occurred in two different places. Bayley, J. (having conferred with Bosanquet, J., and the Recorder), directed the words 'to wit, at the parish of St. Mary-le-bow, in the ward of Cheap,' &c., to be struck out. His lordship also said, that it was deemed by the Court to be necessary to have inserted in the bill an allegation that the prisoner and the deceased were subjects of His Majesty; and the bill was so amended accordingly. Upon the trial it appeared that the deceased was killed in a duel at Boulogne, and that he was an Englishman, born at Islington; and the prisoner had said he was an Irishman, and had come from Kilkenny. It was objected that, under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7, it was necessary to prove that the parties were natural-born subjects of His Majesty; the present Act differed from 33 Hen. VIII. c. 23, the words of which were 'any person or persons,' and that since it never could have been intended that this Act should apply to foreigners domiciled in England, or naturalised either by Act of Parliament (l), or by service to the state, it was necessary to prove, by some one acquainted with the fact, where the prisoner was born, which was a fact the prisoner could not know of his own knowledge. But it was held, that the declaration of the prisoner, unexplained, was, as against himself, evidence to go to the jury; and the case was left to the jury to say, whether they were satisfied by the evidence that the prisoner was a British born subject; for that they must be quite satisfied that such was the fact before they could pronounce him guilty. But it is questionable whether this ruling could now be accepted, and probably that R. v. Sawyer (supra) would be followed (m).

Where an indictment for manslaughter stated that the prisoner being a subject of His Majesty, on land out of the United Kingdom, to wit, at Zanzibar, did make an assault on J. K., and did give him divers mortal wounds, &c., of which he died, at Zanzibar aforesaid, and it appeared that the prisoner, a Spaniard, while in England, entered into articles to serve in a ship bound on a voyage to the Indian seas, and elsewhere, and back to the United Kingdom. On the ship's arrival at Zanzibar, then under the dominion of the Sultan of Muscat, the captain left the vessel, and set up in trade there, and engaged the prisoner to go on shore and act as his interpreter. The new captain seems to have assented, but the crew did not. The ship went one or two short voyages without the prisoner, and having returned to anchor in a roadstead, a few hundred yards from Zanzibar, and the crew being allowed to go on shore, some dispute arose between the prisoner and the deceased, who was one of the crew, which led to the blows, of which the deceased afterwards died on board the ship. It was ruled that there was no evidence of the prisoner being a British subject or under British protection. To claim his allegiance, it must at least be shewn, that he was under British protection. And although he was on board a British ship for a time, yet it seemed as if the articles were abandoned, and he was living on shore, and had been so for months. And, secondly, that the offence was alleged to have been committed on land out of the United Kingdom, but though the blows were given on land, the death took place on board ship, and there was no clause in 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, providing for such a case (n).

Helsham* (supra) was correct, and the Court seems to have thought that that construction was too narrow. Vaughan, J., in charging the grand jury, said, 'there are other ways which may constitute a man a British subject; as, for instance, he may owe allegiance for protection.' The case was decided on the ground that the prisoner was not a British subject in any sense of those words. C. S. G.

(o) 8 St. Tr. (N. S.) 887; 1 F. & F. 240. The first count alleged that Orsini, Gomez, and Rudio at Paris murdered N. Batty; and that the prisoner incited, &c., them to commit the murder; the second count was similar, but described the deceased as unknown. The third count was framed in the old form before 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, by Mr. Greaves; because he thought it might be contended that 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 4, did not extend to indictments against accessories; and it alleged an assault, &c., by the principals, and charged the prisoner with inciting, &c. The fourth count charged the prisoner, being a subject of the Queen, with murdering Batty at Paris. The fifth was like the fourth, but described the deceased as unknown. C. S. G.

(p) The points were: 1. That the prisoner was not one of Her Majesty's subjects within 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7. 2. The prisoner was not an accessory before the fact to any murder within that section. 3. There was no proof of any murder having been committed within that section. 4. That the murder was committed by aliens on aliens in France. 5. No evidence of acts done by the prisoner on land out of the United Kingdom, and without the Queen's dominions, or of any act done by any other person in pursuance of any authority from him on land out of the United Kingdom and without the Queen's dominions, was receivable in evidence on this trial. 6. That the principal offence of murder charged in the first three counts was not alleged to have been committed by any of Her Majesty's subjects. 7. That by the special commission the Court had only jurisdiction to try the prisoner as accessory before the fact, and had no jurisdiction to try the prisoner as principal. 8. That the prisoner, being an alien, could not be tried as principal for a murder alleged in the fourth and fifth counts to have been committed at Paris. As to the first objection, it is clear that a foreigner resident in England is a subject of the Queen; all the authorities prove that rule in general, and 1 Hale, 542, and Courteen's case, Hob. 270, are express that a statute naming the subjects of the Queen includes aliens in England; and besides, 32 Hen. VIII. c. 16, s. 9, enacts that every alien who shall hereafter come into this realm or the dominions of the King, shall be bound by all the laws and statutes of this realm. As to the second, third, fourth, and sixth objections, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, ante, p. 27; and post, p. 835 et seq., relating to conspiracies to murder. As to the fifth objection, every case that has been tried where the death was on land abroad is an answer; for such evidence was admitted in all, and necessarily so; for how can a man be tried for any offence abroad unless the acts relating to it done abroad are admissible in evidence? As to acquitted, were never argued, and most of the points taken are covered by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, sect. 9 (ante p. 27), and the accessories and abettors clauses of the Acts of 1861.

Offences by Officials out of Great Britain.—By an Act of 1698 (11 Will. III. c. 12) (q), oppressions, crimes, and offences committed by governors, lieutenant-governors, or commanders-in-chief of plantations or colonies within the King's dominions beyond the seas are triable in England in the High Court (K.B.D.) The Act is expressed to be against oppression of the King's subjects within their respective governments, and other crimes and offences, 'contrary to the laws of this realm, or in force within their respective governments or commands.' By the Criminal Jurisdiction Act, 1802 (42 Geo. III. c. 85), crimes, misdemeanors, or offences committed out of Great Britain by a person in the service of the King, civil or military, or in any public station, office, or capacity, may be prosecuted in the High Court (K.B.D.) in England, either upon an information exhibited by the Attorney-General, or upon indictment found, and are triable in the counties of London or Middlesex (r). This Act has been held not to apply to felonies (s), but it has been applied to offences by British officials in foreign countries (t). There is also imperial legislation as to the trial in England of certain offences committed in India (u). The provisions of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), as to holding a preliminary inquiry as to offences committed on land beyond the seas for which an indictment may legally be preferred in England or Wales, apply to proceedings under the above Acts, and the High Court is a Court of Oyer and Terminer for trying such offences (v).

Offences in the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England.—The criminal jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England attaches:

1. In the case of piracy jure gentium to all vessels and persons of whatever nationality: and
2. To all British ships, public or private, on the high seas, outside the territorial waters of any state: and
3. To all vessels, British or foreign, within British territorial waters (w), including all ports, havens, and rivers, below bridges, where great ships go. To some extent the jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the common law courts in the case of waters which are within the body of a county: and the seventh objection, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1 (now 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1), making every accessory before the fact triable, &c., as a principal, is an answer. As to the eighth objection, see the remarks on 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1, post, p. 130. C. S. G.

Cunningham*, Bell, 72, an American who on an American ship in the Bristol Channel wounded one of the crew was held to be triable in the county of Glamorgan. In this case the part of the sea where the ship lay was held to be within the body of the realm.

4. To all British public vessels in foreign territorial waters. The jurisdiction is probably exclusive of the jurisdiction of the state to which the waters belong (x): and
5. To all British vessels, public or private, within foreign territorial waters. This jurisdiction is concurrent with, or perhaps subordinate to, the jurisdiction of the state to which the waters belong.

The Admiralty of England (y) has always had criminal jurisdiction in respect of piracy jure gentium, committed by persons or ships of any or no nationality (z), and of offences committed on British ships (a), whether public vessels or merchant ships on the high seas. Conflicts as to jurisdiction arose between the common Courts and the Admiralty as to matters arising in waters within the body of the realm, which led to statutes of 1389 (13 Rich. II. c. 3), and 1391 (15 Rich. II. c. 3). Under the earlier of these Acts the admiral is prohibited from meddling 'of anything done within the realm, but only of a thing done upon the sea.' The later Act, after providing that 'all manner of contracts, pleas and quarrels, and all other things rising within the bodies of counties as well by land as by water and wreck of the sea, shall be tried, determined, discussed and remedied by the laws of the land, and not before nor by the admiral nor his lieutenant in any wise,' proceeds: 'Nevertheless, if the death of a man and if a mayhem done in great ships being and hovering in the main stream of great rivers, only beneath the bridges (b) of the same rivers nigh unto the sea and in none other places of the same rivers the admiral shall have cognisance; and also to arrest ships in the great flotes for the great voyages of the King and of the realm—saving always to the King all manner of forfeitures and profits thereof coming: and he shall have the jurisdiction upon the said flotes during the said voyages only.' . . .

(a) In R. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 63, the majority of the Court held that the Admiral had no jurisdiction to try offences by foreigners on foreign ships even within British waters. See 41 & 42 Vict. c. 78, post, p. 41.

(b) There are various readings in the Norman-French texts of this statute. In the Statutes of the Realm, printed from the Tower Roll, the words are, 'per aual les pountz.' In Rot. Parl. No. 30 the word is pontz: see 7 C. & P. 665n. Old printed copies have pointz or poynztz (4 Co. Inst. 137). Pulton's Calendar, 1612, Pulton's Statutes, 1661, and some old abridgements have ports (Cary's Abr. 1739). In A

Description of the River Thames (Longman, 1752), it is said that the Lord Mayor of London used to summon a jury four times a year 'to make inquisition after all offences committed on the Thames and Medway up the river as far as Staines Bridge, and down the river as far as the points of it next the sea,' and that 'the jurisdiction of the City of London in the river of Thames from Staines Bridge westward unto the points of the river next to the sea eastward, appeareth to belong to the City.' All this appears to be taken from old charters. In 1347 it appears that persons setting kiddels ultra Genland (Yantlett) versus mare were fined (pp. 94, 95, 96). In later times Yendall or Yenlet seems from old charters to be the limit (p. 139). It is clear that 'bridges,' and not 'points' or 'ports,' is the true reading. In Moore, K.B. 892, Dodderidge J., in speaking of the statute, uses the words 'subtles le pont,' and in Leigh v. Burley, Owen, 122, the judge said: 'The translator mistook "bridges" for "points," i.e. the land's end.'

The jurisdiction thus preserved is (as to English rivers) concurrent with, and not exclusive of, the jurisdiction of the common-law Courts (e): and extends to offences committed on a British ship in foreign or colonial ports or waters (d). It is immaterial whether the ship is moving about the foreign waters (e), or at anchor therein (f) or moored to the land (g), so long as she is afloat and below bridges, at a part where the tide ebbs and flows and great ships go. All such waters are, for purposes of indictment and Admiralty jurisdiction, treated as part of the 'high seas,' an expression which, 'when used with reference to the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, includes all oceans, seas, bays, channels, rivers, creeks and waters below low-water mark, and where great ships can go, with the exception only of such parts of such oceans, &c., as are within the body of some county' (h).

In R. v. Coombes (i), a sailor on board a boat which had run aground 100 yards from the shore was shot by a smuggler and died on the sea. The whole offence was held to have been committed within the Admiralty jurisdiction. The decision is supported on the ground that in the case of murder the intention is presumed to follow the act, and so the shot which took effect on the high seas must be presumed to be accompanied thither by the intention with which it was fired, and both these together operate (j); or that the blow struck by the bullet was an act done in the jurisdiction where it hit the sailor (k). According to the decision, the crime must, for the purpose of determining the venue, be held to have been committed on an English ship where the death occurred, a doctrine founded on a convenient fiction (l). R. v. Coombes was in the United States applied so as to exclude the jurisdiction of the United States Courts in the case of a death caused on a foreign vessel, in foreign territorial waters, caused by a shot from a United States vessel in these waters (m).

In R. v. Jemot (n) larceny from a British ship in a natural harbour in Cuba was held to be within the Admiralty jurisdiction.

In R. v. Allen (o) the indictment was for stealing three chests of tea out of the 'Aurora,' of London, on the high seas, and it was proved that the larceny was committed while the vessel lay off Whampoa, in a river, twenty or thirty miles from the sea. There was no evidence as to the tide flowing, or otherwise, at the place where the vessel lay, but it was held that the fact that the tea was stolen on board the vessel, which had crossed the ocean, afforded sufficient evidence that the larceny was committed on the high seas.

In R. v. Anderson (p) an American citizen, engaged as a sailor on a British ship, was held to have been lawfully indicted and convicted of the manslaughter of another American citizen on that ship while she was sailing up the river Garonne, in France, on her way to Bordeaux. At the time when the offence was committed the ship was ninety miles up the river.

In R. v. Carr (q) a prisoner was held to have been lawfully indicted and convicted of larceny on a British ship which at the time of the committing of the offence lay moored to a quay in the port of Rotterdam in Holland, at a point on the river Maas seventeen or eighteen miles above the open sea, but below the bridges.

In R. v. Lesley (r), the defendant, who was master of an English ship, entered into a contract with the Chilian Government to carry from Valparaiso to Liverpool five persons who had been ordered by that Government to be banished. These persons were brought by force on board the ship, guarded by soldiers of that State, and conveyed by the defendant under the contract, and against their will, to Liverpool. At the time he received these persons on board, the ship was lying in the territorial waters of Chili. The defendant was indicted, tried and convicted at Liverpool for false imprisonment and assault. On a case reserved, it was held that so far as it related to what was done in Chilian waters the conviction could not be sustained. Erle, C.J., said: 'We assume that in Chili the act of the Government towards its subjects was lawful; and, although an English ship, in some respects, carries with it the laws of her country in the territorial waters of a foreign State, yet, in other respects, she is subject to the laws of that State, as to acts done to the subjects thereof. We assume that the Government could justify all that it did within its own territory, and we think that it follows that the defendant can justify all that he did there as agent for the Government, and under its authority.' But the conviction was sustained for that which was done out of the Chilian territory (s). As to this, Erle, C.J., said: 'It is clear that an English ship on the high seas out of any foreign territory, is subject to the laws of England; and persons, whether foreign or English, on board such ship, are so much amenable to English law as they would be on English soil' (t). After referring to 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 21 (u), he continued: 'Such being the law, if the act of the prisoner amounted to a false imprisonment he was liable to be convicted. Now, as the contract of the prisoner was to receive the five persons on board the ship and to take them, without their consent, over the sea to England, although he was justified in first receiving them in Chili, yet that justification ceased when he passed the line of Chilian jurisdiction, and after that it was a wrong which was intentionally planned and executed in pursuance of the contract, amounting in law to false imprisonment. It may be that transportation to England is lawful by the law of Chili, and that a Chilian ship might so lawfully transport Chilian subjects; but for an English ship the laws of Chili, out of that State, are powerless, and the lawfulness of the acts must be tried by English law.'

High and Low Water-mark.—Upon the open seashore the common law and the admiral have alternate jurisdiction between high and low water-mark (i.e. the admiral has jurisdiction supra aquam as long as the sea flows, and the common-law Courts jurisdiction over the land so long as the sea does not cover it (v). It is sometimes difficult to fix the line of demarcation between the county and the high sea in harbours, or below the bridges in great rivers. The question is often more a matter of fact than of law, and determinable by local evidence; but some general rules upon the point are collected in East's Pleas of the Crown, where it is said that 'in general it is said that such parts of the rivers, arms, or creeks, are deemed to be within the bodies of counties where persons can see from one side to the other (w). Lord Hale, in his treatise De jure maris, says that the arm or branch of the sea which lies within the fauces terræ, where a man may reasonably discern between shore and shore, is, or at least may be, within the body of a county. Hawkins, however, considers the line more accurately confined, by other authorities, to such parts of the sea where a man, standing on the one side of the land, may see what is done on the other; and the reason assigned by Lord Coke in the Admiralty case (x) in support of the county coroner's jurisdiction, where a man is killed in such places, because that the county may well know it, seems rather to support the more limited construction. But at least, where there is any doubt, the jurisdiction of the common law ought to be preferred' (y).

Bays.—Where a murder was committed in Roundstone Bay, and it appeared that the place in question was within the county of Galway, and that the headlands bounding the bay were so situated that a man could see from the one to the other, and that the place in question would fall within a straight line drawn from the one headland to the other, and that in that part of the bay there were fifteen fathoms water, and that a ship of 120 tons could sail there; but there was no evidence of it having been frequented by shipping, or of any Admiralty process having ever been executed within it; it was held by the judges in Ireland that the murderer was rightly tried under an Admiralty commission (z).

the county of Glamorgan, it appeared that the prisoners were Americans, and they and the person wounded were part of the crew of an American ship, which sailed from the docks of Cardiff to an anchorage in Penarth Roads, and that the offence was committed shortly before she arrived at that anchorage, when the ship was three-quarters of a mile from land, in a place never left dry by the tide ; but was within a quarter of a mile of land which is left dry by the tide. The shore of the county of Glamorgan extends many miles up and down the Bristol Channel from the place where the offence was committed. The spot in question was in the Bristol Channel, between the Glamorganshire and Somersetshire coasts, and was about ten miles from the opposite coast of Somersetshire. Two islands, called the Flat and Steep Holmes, are outside the anchorage-ground, and farther from the shore than it is, but not lower down the Channel, being abreast of the anchorage-ground. When the offence was committed the ship was inside, and about two miles from the Flat Holmes, and four or five miles from the Steep Holmes, and was within the Lavernock Point in Penarth Roads, but outside Penarth Head. Penarth Head and Lavernock Point form a bay. At Penarth Head persons can see from one to the other, and could see what a vessel was doing from one to the other, but could not see the people from one to the other. From where the ship was persons could see people at Lavernock, and see what they were doing if they took particular notice of them, and they could see the coast of Somersetshire on a clear day. The mouth of the Severn is at King's Road, higher up the Channel. The Holmes are part of the parish of St. Mary's, Cardiff. By an order of the Treasury, the port of Cardiff had been fixed so as to include the spot in question. It was objected that the prisoners could not be tried in the county of Glamorgan, as there was no proof that the offence was committed in that county ; but it was held that the offence was committed in that county. Cockburn, C.J. : ' The question is, whether the part of the sea on which the vessel was at the time when the offence was committed forms part of the body of the county of Glamorgan ; and we are of opinion that it does. The sea in question is part of the Bristol Channel, both shores of which form part of England and Wales, of the county of Somerset on one side, and the county of Glamorgan on the other. We are of opinion that, looking at the local situation of this sea, it must be taken to belong to the counties respectively by the shores of which it is bounded ; and the fact of the Holmes, between which and the shore of the county of Glamorgan the place in question is situated, having always been treated as part of the parish of Cardiff, and as part of the county of Glamorgan, is a strong illustration of the principle on which we proceed, namely, that the whole of this inland sea between the counties of Somerset and Glamorgan is to be considered as within the counties, by the shores of which its several parts are respectively bounded. We are, therefore, of opinion that the place in question is within the body of the county of Glamorgan' (a).

Prior to the passing of the statutes now to be mentioned, wherever a murder or other felony against the law of nature or nations was committed in England or on the narrow seas (b), it was triable by jury in the Court of King's Bench and Courts of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery. But wherever a murder or such other felony was committed on the high seas, it could not be tried by a jury (because a jury by the common law could only take cognisance of felonies committed within the local jurisdiction from which they were summoned), but such matters and other felonies were always triable by the Court of Admiralty, which proceeded according to the course of the civil law (c). To this proceeding there was the vital objection that it did not try by a jury (d), and either the accused must plainly confess his offence, or there must be two witnesses who saw the offence committed; and this led to the passing of the Offences at Sea Act, 1536 (28 Hen. VIII. c. 15). The preamble of that Act (e) recites that 'traitors, pirates, thieves, robbers, murderers, and confederators upon the sea many times escape unpunished because the trial of their offences hath heretofore been ordered, judged, and determined before the admiral or his lieutenant or commissary, after the course of the civil laws the nature whereof is that before any judgment of death can be given against the offenders, either they must plainly confess their offences (which they will never do without torture or pains), or else their offences be so plainly and directly proved by witness indifferent, such as saw their offence committed, which cannot be gotten but at chance at few times.' . . . Sect. 1 enacts 'that all treasons, felonies, robberies, murders, and confederacies, committed in or upon the sea (f), or in any other haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral or admirals have, or pretend to have, power, authority, or jurisdiction, shall be inquired, tried, heard, determined, and judged, in such shires and places in the realm as shall be limited by the King's commission, or commissions to be directed for the same, or like form and conditions as if any such offence or offences had been done in or upon the land' (g).

The Act did not create or alter any offence, but left the offences as they were before it passed, and all the offences mentioned in it were, before its passing, triable in the Court of Admiralty, and were by the Act made triable by a jury (h).

By the Offences at Sea Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. c. 37), s. 1, 'all and every offence and offences, which, after the passing of this Act (May 10, 1799), shall be committed upon the high seas out of the body of any county of this realm, shall be, and they are hereby declared to be offences of the same nature respectively, and to be subject to the same punishments respectively, as if they had been committed upon the shore, and

IV. c. 28, s. 12), 'All offences prosecuted in the High Court of Admiralty of England shall upon every first and subsequent conviction be subject to the same punishments, whether of death or otherwise, as if such offences had been committed upon the land.' (j) By the Central Criminal Court Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 36), s. 22, 'the justices and judges named in the commission constitute the Court, or any two or more of them have power to inquire, hear, and determine any offence or offences committed or alleged to have been committed on the high seas and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, and to deliver the gaol of Newgate (or other appointed prison of the Court (j)), of any person committed thereto, or detained therein, for any offence or offences committed or alleged to have been done and committed upon the high seas, aforesaid, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England: and all indictments found, and trials and other proceedings had and taken before the said justices and judges of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery shall be valid and effectual to all intents and purposes whatsoever' (k).

Before the passing of the nineteenth-century Acts, presently to be stated controversies arose in cases in which the Admiralty and the common-law Courts had or claimed concurrent jurisdiction on the narrow seas (l). In R. v. Bruce (m), a trial at the Admiralty session at the Old Bailey for murder committed in a part of Milford Haven, where it was about three miles across, about seven or eight miles from the mouth of the river, or open sea, and about sixteen miles below any bridges over the river, the question was raised whether the place where the murder was committed was within the limits to which the commission granted under the Offences at Sea Act, 1536 (n), by law extended. The judges were unanimously of opinion that the trial was properly had, and that there was no objection to the conviction on the ground of want of jurisdiction in respect of the place under the commission of the Court of trial. During the discussion of the point the construction of Hale (o) was much preferred to that of Coke (p); and most, if not all, of the judges, seemed to have thought that the common law has concurrent jurisdiction with the Admiralty in all havens, creeks, and rivers in this realm, and that the Act of 1536 applied to all great waters frequented by ships; that in such waters the admiral, of 1536 had no jurisdiction, and in the former event the offender could not be indicted before a common-law Court, even when the offence was theft and the goods were carried ashore. 2 East, P. An accessory before the fact to a felony committed on the high seas within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, may be indicted and tried at the Central Criminal Court, under 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 36, s. 22 (ante, p. 38), although the principal had not been 'committed to, or detained in,' Newgate (r).

The Admiralty Offences Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 2), after reciting the Act of 1536 (ante, p. 37), and that it is expedient that provision be made for the trial of persons charged with offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, enacts (sect. 1) 'that His Majesty's justices of assize or others His Majesty's commissioners by whom any Court shall be holden under any of His Majesty's commissions of oyer and terminer or general gaol delivery shall have severally and jointly all the powers which by any Act are given to the commissioners named in any commission of oyer and terminer for the trying of offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, and that it shall be lawful for the first-mentioned justices and commissioners, or any one or more of them, to inquire of, hear, and determine all offences alleged to have been committed on the high seas and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, and to deliver the gaol in every county and franchise within the limits of their several commissions of any person committed to or imprisoned therein for any offence alleged to have been committed upon the high seas and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England ; and all indictments found, and trials and other proceedings had, by and before the said justices and commissioners shall be valid' (s). This Act gives to Courts of Oyer and Terminer, &c., the same jurisdiction as was possessed by commissioners under the Act of 1536 and by the Court of Admiralty before that Act. It does not affect the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court or of special commissions under the Act of 1536 (t).

By sect. 2, 'in all indictments preferred before the said justices and commissioners under this Act the venue laid in the margin shall be the same as if the offence had been committed in the county where the trial is had ; and all material facts which in other indictments would be averred to have taken place in the county where the trial is had shall in indictments prepared (u) and tried under this Act be averred to have taken place "on the high seas" (v). It seems, therefore, that 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2, s. 3 is virtually repealed.

larceny 'on the high seas' was held sufficient, without adding 'within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty' (w). The provisions as to alleging that the offence was committed on the high seas seems to be directory (x).

Each of the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 115; c. 97, s. 72; c. 98, s. 50; c. 99, s. 36; and c. 100, s. 68, contains the following clause:—

'All indictable offences mentioned in this Act which shall be committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England and Ireland shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature and liable to the same punishments as if they had been committed upon the land in England or Ireland, and may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in any county or place in England or Ireland in which the offender shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if they had been actually committed in that county or place; and in any indictment for any such offence, or for being an accessory to such an offence, the venue in the margin shall be the same as if the offence had been committed in such county or place, and the offence shall be averred to have been committed "on the high seas": Provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect any of the laws relating to the government of His Majesty's land or naval forces' (y).

It is to be noted that these enactments do not expressly extend to attempts to commit the crimes in question in the Admiralty jurisdiction. From this it would seem to follow that Courts of Quarter Sessions cannot, under the enactments, try such attempts, but that they are cognisable at assizes under 7 & 8 Vict., c. 2 (ante, p. 39).

By sect. 9 of the Accessories, &c., Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 94); 'Where any person shall, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England or Ireland, become an accessory to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, and whether such felony shall be committed within that jurisdiction or elsewhere, or shall be begun elsewhere or completed within that jurisdiction, the offence of such person shall be felony' (z).

IV. c. 56, s. 55 (I.); and 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 41 (I.); together with 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2. Some of these enactments simply provided for the trial of offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty; whilst others provided in addition that the offences mentioned in the Act, which shall be committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature and liable to the same punishments as if they had been committed on the land in England or Ireland. It seems clear that, wherever an Act creates new offences, this is the proper form of enactment; for, though in the case of offences against the law of nations, such as murder or piracy committed on the seas, the general course of legislation has been simply to provide for their trial, and no doubt correctly, because, in the eye of the law of England, they were offences of the same nature as if they had been committed on land in England, yet it may well be doubted whether that be sufficient in the case of newly created offences; and it is certainly much safer to have the provision with which this clause commences. C. S. G.

(z) The rest of the section as to indictment is in similar terms to those above quoted from the other Crim. Law Consolidation Acts.

Under these enactments, Courts of Assize (a) and Quarter Sessions (b) for counties or boroughs have authority to try any offender apprehended or in custody within their local jurisdiction for any offence or offences mentioned in the Acts of 1861, committed on the sea, which they might have tried if it had been committed within the local jurisdiction.

The Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 73) (c), begins by two recitals, 'Whereas the rightful jurisdiction of His Majesty, his heirs and successors extends, and has always extended, over the open seas adjacent to the coasts of the United Kingdom, and of all other parts of His Majesty's dominions to such a distance as is necessary for the defence and security of such dominions' (d), and 'whereas it is expedient that all offences committed on the open sea within a certain distance of the coasts of the United Kingdom, and of all other parts of His Majesty's dominions, by whomsoever committed, should be dealt with according to law.' By sect. 2: 'An offence committed by a person, whether he is or is not a subject of His Majesty on the open sea within the territorial waters of His Majesty's dominions, is an offence within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, although it may have been committed on board or by means of a foreign ship, and the person who committed such offence may be arrested, tried, and punished accordingly.'

By sect. 3: 'Proceedings for the trial and punishment of a person who is not a subject of His Majesty and who is charged with any such offence as is declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, shall not be instituted in any Court of the United Kingdom, except with the consent of one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, and on his certificate that the institution of such proceedings is in his opinion expedient, and shall not be instituted in any of the dominions of His Majesty out of the United Kingdom, except with the leave of the governor of the part of the dominions in which such proceedings are proposed to be instituted, and on his certificate that it is expedient that such proceedings should be instituted.'

By sect. 4: 'On the trial of any person who is not a subject of His Majesty for an offence declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, it shall not be necessary to aver in any indictment or information on such trial that such consent or certificate of the Secretary of State or Governor, as is required by this Act, has been given; and the fact of the same having been given shall be presumed, unless disputed by

(c) Passed in consequence of R. v. Keyn (the 'Franconia'), 2 Ex. D. 63. In that case the prisoner, who was a foreigner and in command of a foreign ship, whilst passing within three miles of the English shore, ran down and sank a British ship, whereby one of her passengers was drowned under circumstances which in English law would amount to manslaughter. He was tried at the Central Criminal Court, but on appeal it was held by the majority of the court that there was no power to try offences committed by foreigners on board foreign ships while within the three miles limit.

' Proceedings before a justice of the peace or other magistrate, previous to the committal of an offender for trial, or to the determination of the justice or magistrate that the offender is to be put upon his trial, shall not be deemed proceedings for the trial of the offence committed by such offender, for the purposes of the said consent and certificate under this Act.'

By sect. 5: ' Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to be in derogation of any rightful jurisdiction of His Majesty, his heirs or successors, under the law of nations, or to affect or prejudice any jurisdiction conferred by Act of Parliament or now by law existing in relation to foreign ships, or in relation to persons on board such ships.'

By sect. 6: ' This Act shall not prejudice or affect the trial in manner heretofore in use of any act of piracy as defined by the law of nations, or affect or prejudice any law relating thereto (e), and where any act of piracy as defined by the law of nations is also any such offence as is declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, such offence may be tried in pursuance of this Act, or in pursuance of any other Act of Parliament, law, or custom relating thereto.'

By sect. 7: ' In this Act, unless there is something inconsistent in the context, the following expressions shall respectively have the meanings hereafter assigned to them, that is to say: " The jurisdiction of the Admiral " as under this Act includes the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England and Ireland, or either of such jurisdictions as used in any Act of Parliament; and for the purpose of arresting any person charged with an offence declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, the territorial waters adjacent to the United Kingdom or any other part of His Majesty's dominions shall be deemed to be within the jurisdiction of any judge, magistrate, or officer having power within such United Kingdom or other part of His Majesty's dominions to issue warrants for arresting or to arrest persons charged with offences committed within the jurisdiction of such judge, magistrate, or officer.'

' United Kingdom ' includes the Isle of Man, the Channel Islands, and other adjacent islands.

' The territorial waters of His Majesty's dominions,' in reference to the sea, means such part of the sea adjacent to the coast of the United Kingdom or the coast of some other part of His Majesty's dominions as is deemed by international law to be within the territorial sovereignty of His Majesty; and for the purpose of any offence declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, any part of the open sea within one marine league of the coast measured from low water-mark, shall be deemed to be open sea within the territorial waters of His Majesty's dominions.'

' Offence,' as used in this Act, means an act, neglect, or default of such a description as would, if committed within the body of a county in England, be punishable on indictment according to the law of England for the time being in force.

'Ship' includes every description of boat or other floating craft; 'foreign ship' means every ship which is not a British ship (f).

By sect. 686 (g) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60): '(1) where any person being a British subject is charged with having committed an offence on board any British ship on the high seas, or in any foreign port or harbour, or on board any foreign ship to which he does not belong, or not being a British subject, is charged with having committed any offence on board any British ship on the high seas, and that person is found (h), within the jurisdiction of any Court in His Majesty's dominions, which would have had cognisance of the offence if it had been committed on board a British ship within the limits of its ordinary jurisdiction, that Court shall have jurisdiction to try the offence as if it had so been committed.

'(2) Nothing in this section shall affect the Admiralty Offences (Colonial) Act, 1849' (i).

By sect. 687 (j): 'All offences against property or person committed in or at any place either ashore or afloat out of His Majesty's dominions by any master, seaman, or apprentice who, at the time when the offence is committed, is or within three months previously has been employed in any British ship, shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature respectively, and be liable to the same punishments respectively, and be inquired of, heard, tried, determined, and adjudged in the same manner and by the same Courts and in the same places as if such offences had been committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England' (k). By sect. 689, power is given to a British consular officer to detain any master, seaman, or apprentice employed on any British ship, on complaint that any offence against property or person has been committed by him, at any place, ashore or afloat, out of His Majesty's dominions or on the high seas, and may send him in custody to the United Kingdom or to any British possession, in which there is a court capable of taking cognisance of his offence.

To prove that a ship is a British merchant ship, it is not essential to produce the register or a copy thereof, it is sufficient to show that she carries the British flag, and belongs to British owners (l).

The prisoner was convicted of manslaughter committed on board a ship on the high seas, the ship was built at Kiel, in the duchy of Holstein, and sailed thence to London, and thence on the voyage in which the offence was committed. All the officers and crew were foreigners; the prisoner was the second mate, and the deceased the master. The ship was sailing under the English flag when the offence was committed. The crew were told before sailing that Mr. Rehder was sole owner. He was not born an Englishman. A certified copy of the register of the 'Gustav Adolph' under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), was admitted as prima facie evidence that the ship was a British ship. Certain letters were put in, which, it was urged, showed a partnership between Rehder and Ehlers, and it was urged that under ss. 18, 38, and 103, the owner of a beneficial interest in a British ship must be qualified in the same way as the owner of a legal interest; that, even admitting that the registration of the ship in the name of Rehder was prima facie evidence that he was owner, it could be no evidence of Ehler's qualification, and therefore the letters proving Ehler's interest in the ship rebutted the prima facie evidence that she was a British ship. On a case reserved, it was held that there was prima facie evidence that she was a British ship; as there was evidence of a certificate of registry in London, wherein Rehder was described as the owner at that time resident in London, and the ship was sailing under the British flag; but that the prima facie proof was rebutted by the proof that Rehder was alien born; and that there was no presumption that letters of denization or naturalisation had been granted to him, by reason that he, being alien born, would have become liable to penalties under the Act for registering the ship as belonging to a British owner (m).

By the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 22, s. 18), 'For the purpose of giving jurisdiction to courts under this Act, a sea-fishing boat shall be deemed to be a ship within the meaning of any Act relating to offences committed on board a ship, and every court shall have the same jurisdiction over a foreign sea-fishing boat within the exclusive fishery limits of the British Islands and persons belonging thereto as such court would have if such boat were a British sea-fishing boat.'

By the Behring Sea Award Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 2(n)), persons committing, procuring, aiding, or abetting a contravention of the Act are guilty of a misdemeanor within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and by the Sea Fisheries North Pacific Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 21), like provisions are made as to contravention of Orders in Council (o).

To a count for murder which alleged to have been committed 'upon the high seas,' it was objected that it ought to have averred that the prisoners were on board a British ship, or that they were British subjects; and to counts alleging that the prisoner was master of a British ship afloat in the river Elbe, and that he there committed the murder, it was objected that these counts did not allege the murder to have been committed 'on the high seas.' The objection was overruled by Wightman, J. (p).

These enactments apply only to British merchant ships. Offences on public ships are dealt with under the Admiralty jurisdiction and the other statutes above mentioned, or the Naval Discipline Act (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109). 'British ship' is defined by sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), as one owned wholly by British subjects by birth or naturalisation or denizens, or by bodies corporate, established, and subject to the laws of some part of His Majesty's dominions, and having their principal place of business in these dominions. A prisoner was charged at the Liverpool Assizes with the wilful murder of the captain of the hulk 'Kent' in the Bonny River, Africa. It was proved that the 'Kent' had been a sailing ship, and was registered as a British ship though not British built. She had been for eighteen months dismasted and used as a floating depot in the Bonny River for a line of steamers trading from Liverpool. She floated in the tideway of the river and hoisted the British ensign at the peak. The prisoner was proved to have seized the captain and thrown him overboard, and he was not seen again. Archibald, J., held that there was sufficient evidence that the 'Kent' was a British ship to give the Court jurisdiction, and that it was not necessary that the crime should be wholly completed on board such ship (q). By sect. 2, a vessel required to be registered as a British ship, and not so registered is not recognised as a British ship. By sect. 72, 'where it is declared by this Act that a British ship shall not be recognised as a British ship, that ship shall not be entitled to any benefits, privileges, advantages, or protection usually enjoyed by British ships, nor to use the British flag or assume the British national character, but so far as regards the payment of dues, the liability to pains and penalties, and the punishment of offences committed on board such ship or by any persons belonging to her, such ship shall be dealt with in the same manner in all respects as if she were a recognised British ship' (r).

Sect. 687 applies to alien members of the crew as well as to British subjects. In R. v. Lopez (s), upon an indictment for wounding, with intent to do some grievous bodily harm, it was proved that the prisoner, a foreigner, being a sailor and one of the crew of a British ship, maliciously and unlawfully wounded Smith, also a foreigner and a sailor and one of the crew of the ship, whilst on the high seas and in the same ship, was tried and convicted at the Assizes at Exeter; and upon a case reserved, the conviction was affirmed. He was not found within the jurisdiction of the Court at Exeter, but was brought into the jurisdiction in custody and against his will having been 'found' in the ship (t). Lord Campbell, C.J., in giving the judgment of the Court said: 'We are all of opinion that the conviction must be sustained. We have no doubt that the offence committed by the prisoner was, under the circumstances, an offence against the laws of England. The prisoner, a foreigner, was in an English ship; he was under the protection of English laws, and he therefore owed obedience to the English laws, and was guilty of an offence against those laws when he maliciously wounded another foreigner, one of the crew of the same ship, on the high seas. It is unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the authorities cited to prove that proposition,—they are quite overwhelming. Then the only other question is, whether there was jurisdiction under the commission of oyer and terminer to try the prisoner at Exeter for that offence; and upon that point we entertain as little doubt. The Court at Exeter would not have had jurisdiction (u) before 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 21 (v); but that statute is quite conclusive on the subject, and seems to have been passed for the purpose of removing any doubt that might arise. It provides that offences committed by foreigners in British vessels on the high seas may be tried by any Court within the jurisdiction of which the offender is found, if the offence is one which would have been cognisable by such Court, supposing it to have been committed within the limits of its ordinary jurisdiction. Here the offence, if committed within the county of Devon, would certainly have been triable at Exeter; and as the prisoner was found within that jurisdiction, it is the same as if the offence had been committed within the limits of that jurisdiction; and we therefore think there was clearly jurisdiction in the Court at Exeter to try him there, and that he was legally convicted.' This decision really turned on 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 267 (uu), but independently of legislation the offence was within the Admiralty jurisdiction (vv).

English Courts have not except in the case of piracy jure gentium (w) any jurisdiction to try any person for an offence committed on or by means of a foreign, public or private vessel outside British territorial waters (x). On the high seas a ship whether public or private is considered for purposes of jurisdiction a part of the territory of the nation to which the ship belongs, and (except in the case of piracy jure gentium), as subject only to the law of the flag which she is entitled to fly. In this context the term 'high seas' does not include the territorial waters of a nation other than that to which the ship belongs. The result of the rule is that a British subject is not punishable by the law of England for offences committed on the high seas on a foreign ship, whether he is or is not a member of the crew of the ship; and that a foreigner committing an offence on a British ship on the high seas is amenable to British justice whether he is or is not a member of the crew (y).

In R. v. Depardo (z) it was held that there was no jurisdiction to try in England under a commission issued in pursuance of 33 Hen. VIII.

(u) 'This dictum is unnecessary and erroneous. In the argument, Cockburn, C.J., said: "There is strong opinion that but for the venue a person committing an offence on the high seas on an English ship would have been amenable to punishment at the common law," and that opinion is clearly right.' c. 23 (a) and 43 Geo. III. c. 113, s. 66 (b); an indictment for manslaughter of an Englishman, committed in China, by an alien enemy who had been prisoner of war and was at the time of the alleged offence, acting as a mariner on a British merchant ship.

In R. v. Lewis (c) a foreigner on a foreign ship on the high seas, inflicted a blow on another foreigner which resulted in the death of the latter. The death took place in England. It was held that the offence was not rendered cognisable in England by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 8, by reason of the fact that the death occurred in England, because the act which caused the death was not cognisable in England, the accused not being a British subject, and not falling within sect. 2 of the Act. The enactments referred to are repealed and replaced by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 9, 10.

Homicide partly at Sea, partly on Shore.—Where a person was struck, &c., upon the high seas, and died upon shore, the admiral had no cognisance of the offence (d); and it was doubtful whether such offence could be tried at common law (e). By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 10, 'Where any person being feloniously stricken, poisoned, or otherwise hurt upon the sea, or at any place out of England or Ireland, shall die of such stroke, poisoning, or hurt in England or Ireland, or being feloniously stricken, poisoned, or otherwise hurt at any place in England or Ireland, shall die of such stroke, poisoning, or hurt upon the sea, or at any place out of England or Ireland, every offence committed in respect of any such case, whether the same shall amount to the offence of murder or of manslaughter, or of being accessory to murder or manslaughter, may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in the county or place in England or Ireland in which such death, stroke, poisoning, or hurt shall happen, in the same manner in all respects as if such offence had been wholly committed in that county or place' (f).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner, who was not a British subject, shipped on board ship at New York, and signed articles to serve as a seaman therein, and so did the deceased, who was also not a British subject. The ship was American owned, commanded by an American master, and sailed under the flag of the United States. The prisoner during the voyage to Liverpool exercised much cruelty to the deceased, of which he died at Liverpool; the last act of cruelty was committed on the high seas four days before the ship arrived at Liverpool. Upon a case reserved, it was held that the prisoner was not liable to be tried in England. The Court considered that 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 8 (g), was obviously intended to prevent a defeat of justice, from the difficulty of trial where the death occurred in a different place from that at which the blow causing it was given; and ought not to be construed as making a homicide cognisable in England by reason only of death occurring here, unless it would have been so cognisable if the death had ensued at the place where the blow was given (h), the homicide would have been, in this particular case, by sect. 8, if the offender had been a British subject, but not otherwise (i).

Where a person standing on the shore of a harbour fired a loaded musket at a revenue cutter which had struck upon a sandbank in the sea, about a hundred yards from the shore, by which another was maliciously killed on board the boat, it was held that the trial must be in the Admiralty Court, and not at common law (j).

It is said that a foreigner illegally detained upon a British ship is not liable for acts done on the ship to effect his escape (k). But in respect of acts not done for such purposes he is liable as if he were voluntarily aboard. In R. v. Sattler (l) upon an indictment for murder, tried at the Central Criminal Court, it appeared that S. the prisoner was a foreigner and had committed a larceny in England, and then went with part of the stolen property to Hamburg. The deceased, who was a detective officer of the London police force, and a British subject, with the assistance of the police of Hamburg, arrested S. there, and brought him against his will on board an English steamer trading between Hamburg and London, in order that he might be tried for the larceny. Hamburg is on the river Elbe, sixty miles from the sea; but the tide flows higher up than the place where the steamer was when S. was taken on board. The steamer left Hamburg on November 21, S. being in irons, and on November 22, whilst on the high seas, he shot the deceased, who died of the wound. If the killing had been by an Englishman, in an English county, it would have been murder. The deceased had no warrant; and a case was reserved upon the question whether there was any jurisdiction to try S. at the Central Criminal Court. It was argued for the prisoner, (1) that the original arrest at Hamburg was unlawful and that the prisoner was illegally taken on board the steamer (m); (2) that as the prisoner was brought by force against his will into British jurisdiction no allegiance was created. For the Crown it was contended, that it was a general principle that a ship, public or private on the high seas, was, for the purpose of jurisdiction over crimes therein committed, a part of the territory of the country to which the ship belongs; and a person coming voluntarily or involuntarily on board an English ship was as much amenable to the criminal law of England as if he came voluntarily or involuntarily into an English county (n).

K. 53. In that case aliens were tried (under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2) for murder on a Brazilian vessel which had been seized by a British cruiser for being concerned in the slave trade. The majority of the Court held that there was no jurisdiction, because there was not sufficient evidence to show that the vessel was lawfully in the possession of the British Crown. The persons responsible for the detention are liable to indictment under English law. R. v. Lesley, Bell, 220.

Lord Campbell in giving the judgment of the Court said: 'We think it equally clear that, although the prisoner was a foreigner, the offence of which he was convicted was an offence against the laws of England. Here a crime is committed by the prisoner on board an English ship on the high seas, which would have been murder if the killing had been by an Englishman in an English county; and we are of opinion that, under these circumstances, whether the capture at Hamburg and the subsequent detention were lawful or unlawful, the prisoner was guilty of murder and an offence against the laws of England; for he was in an English ship,—part of the territory of England,—entitled to the protection of the English law, and he owed obedience to that law; and he committed the crime of murder—that is to say, he shot the detective officer, not for the purpose of obtaining his liberation, but for revenge, and of malice prepense. Then comes the question, whether the Central Criminal Court had jurisdiction to try the prisoner for this offence; and it appears to us that the late Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 91, s. 21 (o), was framed for the purpose of obviating, and does obviate, all doubt upon such a subject. A man is "found" wherever he is actually present, and the prisoner was "found" within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, and we are all of opinion that the Court had jurisdiction to try him. It was contended that the prisoner was not "found" within the jurisdiction, because he was brought within it against his will; but, upon the construction of the statute, we are all of a different opinion.' And from the decision in R. v. Anderson (p) it would seem that the fact of the presence of a foreigner on board a British ship whether he is there as a member of the crew or casually, and whether voluntarily or involuntarily is enough to give jurisdiction to British Courts over crimes by him committed on the ship.

Offences in the Admiralty Jurisdiction. (Colonies and India).—The statutes above referred to relate only to the trial in England or Ireland of offences committed within the jurisdiction of the admiral. Colonial legislatures have not as a general rule any authority to give jurisdiction to the offences committed outside the territory or waters of the possession (q).

The Offences at Sea Act, 1806 (46 Geo. III, c. 54) (r), enacts, sect. 1. that, 'all treasons, piracies, felonies, robberies, murders, conspiracies, and other offences of what nature or kind soever, committed upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, may be inquired of, tried, heard, determined and adjudged, according to the common course of the laws of this

(n) The questions reserved were, 'Was the custody of the prisoner on board the steamer lawful, and is there any distinction as to the times when the steamer was in the river Elbe, and whilst she was upon the high seas?' [On this the Court gave no opinion.] And, 'Supposing the custody not to have been lawful, was the killing necessarily only manslaughter?'

And it further enacts, that 'all persons convicted of any of the said offences so to be tried, &c., shall be liable to the same pains, &c., as, by any laws now (May 23, 1806) in force, persons convicted of the same would be liable to in case the same were tried, &c., within this realm, by virtue of any commission according to the directions of the Offences at Sea Act, 1536.'

The Admiralty Offences (Colonial) Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 96), enacts sect. 1, that 'if any person within any colony shall be charged with the commission of any treason, piracy, felony, robbery, murder, conspiracy, or other offence, of what nature or kind soever committed upon the sea (ss), or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral, or admirals, have power, authority, or jurisdiction, or if any person charged with the commission of any such offence upon the sea, or in any such haven, river, creek, or place, shall be brought for trial to any colony. Then, and in every such case, all magistrates, justices of the peace, public prosecutors, juries, judges, courts, public officers, and other persons in such colony, shall have, and exercise, the same jurisdiction and authority for inquiring of, trying, hearing, determining, and adjudging such offences, and they are hereby respectively authorised and required to institute and carry on all such proceedings for the bringing of such person so charged as aforesaid, to trial and for and auxiliary to and consequent upon the trial of any such person, for any such offence, wherewith he may be charged as aforesaid, or by the law of the colony would, and ought, to have been had and exercised, or instituted and carried on by them respectively, if such offence had been committed, and such person had been charged with having committed the same, upon any waters situate within the limits of any such colony, and within the limits of the local jurisdiction of the courts of criminal justice of such colony' (s).

Sect. 3: 'Where any person shall die in any colony of any stroke, poisoning, or hurt, such person having been feloniously stricken, poisoned, or hurt, upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral, or admirals, have power, authority, or jurisdiction, or at any place out of such colony, every offence committed in respect of any

Sect. 5: 'For the purposes of this Act colony shall mean any island, plantation, colony, dominion, fort, or factory, of His Majesty, except any island within the United Kingdom, and the islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, and the islands adjacent thereto, respectively' (u). The Act of 1849 was extended to British India in 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 88) (v), and is not affected by any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. 60) (w).

By the Admiralty Offences Colonial Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 122), it is made 'lawful for the legislature of any of His Majesty's possessions abroad to enact by any law or ordinance to be by them made in the usual manner that where any person being feloniously stricken, poisoned, or otherwise hurt at any place within the limits of such possession, shall die of such stroke, poisoning, or hurt upon the sea or at any place out of the limits of such possession, every offence committed in respect of any such case, whether the same shall amount to the offence of murder or manslaughter, or of being accessory before or after the fact to murder or manslaughter, may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished, in the possession within the limits of which such stroke, poisoning, or hurt shall happen in the same manner in all respects as if such offence had been wholly committed within the limits of such possession, or such legislature may by any such law or ordinance to be made, as aforesaid, to the like effect.'

The Courts Colonial Jurisdiction Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 27), enacts (sect. 3), that 'When by virtue of any Act of Parliament now, or hereafter to be, passed, a person is tried in the court of any colony (x) for any crime or offence committed on the high seas or elsewhere out of the territorial limits of such colony, and of the local jurisdiction of such Offences within sects. 686 & 687, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. 60), are triable in the criminal Courts of British possessions (y).

The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 27), denies to the Courts created by or under the Act any 'jurisdiction under this Act to try or punish any person for an offence which, according to the law of England, is punishable on indictment,' sect. 2, sub-s. 3 (c).

Jurisdiction over Offences initiated outside, but taking Effect within the Realm.—The question from time to time arises whether, and to what extent, and on what principle an English court has jurisdiction to try indictments, in respect of acts done outside the realm, or initiated outside the realm, and taking effect within it. So far as concerns acts done on the sea, whether within or without the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, this subject is treated ante, pp. 31 et seq. As regards offences completely committed on land outside England; it seems clear that no jurisdiction to try in England can be asserted except under the express provisions of a statute.

But there remains another class of case in which the acts constituting the offence take place partly in England and partly on land outside England, or on a vessel not subject to the jurisdiction of the English Courts.

From the point of view of international law the cases fall into three divisions—

1. Where the act is initiated in another part of the British Empire, and takes effect in England.
2. Where the act is by a British subject, and is initiated in a foreign country, but takes effect in England.
3. Where the act is initiated in a foreign country, and takes effect in England, but is done by an alien.

In R. v. Johnson (z), an indictment was found in Middlesex against a judge of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, for causing the publication in Westminster of a seditious libel. The defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the Court setting forth that he was a native of and resident in Ireland, and that Ireland was subject to its own laws and not those of Great Britain, and had its own competent Courts. This plea on demurrer was quashed for not stating what Court was competent to try the offence: but it was intimated that the proper mode of setting up the defence that no English Court could try the defendant was by plea in bar or by evidence on plea of not guilty. Lord Ellenborough said (a), 'If then the circumstances attending the defendant, of his birth in Ireland and his residence there at the time of the publication made in this country, have the effect of rendering him not punishable in any Court of this country for such publication, this impunity must follow as a consequence of its being no crime in the defendant so circumstanced to publish a libel in Middlesex. And indeed the argument rested wholly upon this position, that the defendant owed no obedience to the laws of this part of the United Kingdom, and if he owed no obedience then he had been guilty of no crime in acting contrary to them (b). Such defence, if it can be, may prove available in law as matter of absolute bar.'

Judge Johnson was subsequently tried on the indictment (c), and after certain legal arguments (not involving the point left open as above stated), was found guilty. Lord Ellenborough, C.J., said: 'One who procures another to publish a libel is no doubt guilty of the publication in whatever county it is in fact published in consequence of his procurement.' This ruling, while undoubtedly correct as between county and county of England (d), does not specifically deal with a case in which the offender charged with procuring is not within the realm when he does the acts on which it is sought to make him criminally responsible.

In R. v. Munton (e), a government store-keeper in Antigua, while there resident, transmitted to his agent in London false returns, which were by the agent delivered at the Navy office in London. He was indicted in Middlesex for colluding with contractors by these false vouchers to defraud the Crown. It was objected that the Court could not take cognisance of matters committed out of the realm. Lord Kenyon held that that objection would be valid 'where the criminal matter arose wholly abroad,' and agreed that in such a case to warrant the interposition of the Court of King's Bench an Act of Parliament was expressly necessary: but he ruled that an offence was committed in London where the false returns were received and the fraud completed by their allowance, and that the jurisdiction of the Court then attached.

In R. v. Brisac (f), an information was filed at common law and tried in Middlesex for conspiracy between the captain and purser of a man-of-war, for planning and fabricating false vouchers to cheat the Crown. The evidence showed that the planning and fabrication took place on the high seas at Brassa Sound or at Lerwick in Shetland. The only acts proved to have been done in Middlesex were the delivery of the vouchers to the commissioners of victualling by innocent persons to whom they had been transmitted by the defendants, and the application for a receipt of payment there by the holder of a bill of exchange, the consideration for which was evidenced by the false vouchers. After conviction it was objected on behalf of Brisac that the offence charged was committed on the high seas and could only be tried by virtue of 39 Geo. III. c. 37 (g), under a commission granted under 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15 (h). Grose, J., ruled (1) that these statutes did not take away the jurisdiction of the Courts of common law to try offences which they had power to try before the acts were passed; (2) that conspiracy may be tried wherever any distinct overt act of conspiracy is in fact committed. In support of this proposition he relied on R. v. Bowes (i), a case of conspiracy in which some overt acts were done in Middlesex, and the rest in other counties.

In R. v. Buttery (j) the defendant was indicted and tried in Herefordshire for obtaining goods by false pretences. The pretences were made in Herefordshire, and the goods supplied in Monmouthshire. It was ruled that the indictment was laid in the wrong county. The decision turned on the interpretation of 30 Geo. II. c. 24 (rep.), as to obtaining property by false pretences: and the only question was as to the proper county to try acts undoubtedly cognisable by English law. Certain doubts existed at that date as to whether felonies or misdemeanors committed partly in one county and partly in another could be tried in either (k), and these doubts were as to both felony and misdemeanor settled in 1826 (7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 12) (l), as between the counties of England. This decision does not touch cases in which the person accused was not in England when the act alleged to constitute the crime was done there (m).

In R. v. Ellis (n) the indictment was for obtaining credit by false pretences contrary to sects. 11 (13) and 13 (1) of the Debtors Act, 1869. The evidence was that the defendant carried on business in the county of Durham, and that goods were delivered to him there by a firm in Glasgow on the faith of false representations made by the defendant in Glasgow to the firm. On conviction, a question was raised as to the jurisdiction to try the offence in the county of Durham. The conviction was upheld. The majority of the (o) Court held that the offence consisted in obtaining the goods, and not in making the false representations, and that an English Court can try for obtaining goods within the jurisdiction by false representations made beyond the jurisdiction. Wright, J., held that the possession of the goods could on the evidence be treated as had in the county of Durham under a representation made in Glasgow, but continuing in Durham. The majority relied on the authority of R. v. Buttery and R. v. Burdett (k): but Wright, J., considered R. v. Buttery as inapplicable to a case where the pretence was in another country, saying, 'Where the false pretence has been made in a foreign country, the law of that country as to false pretences may not be the same as it is here' (p).

In R. v. Oliphant (q) the defendant was indicted for omitting or concurring in omitting certain particulars from the cash-book of his employers, contrary to the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 24). The evidence was that he was employed as manager in Paris of a branch establishment of a firm carrying on business in London: that it was his daily duty to make up on slips an account of all sums received by him in Paris, and transmit the slips to London, that the amounts might be entered in a cash-book kept in London: that he had received and fraudulently misappropriated certain sums, and omitted to enter the amounts so taken in the slips transmitted, knowing and intending that the sums omitted from the slips would, in consequence, be omitted from the cash-book. It was objected that there was no jurisdiction to try the offence in England. The Court overruled the objection on the authority of R. v. Munton (r) and R. v. Brisac (s). Reference was made arguendo to R. v. Johnson (t), R. v. Girwood (u), and R. v. Coombes (v).

In R. v. von Veltheim (w) the defendant, an alien, was convicted under sect. 44 of the Larceny Act, 1861, for sending a letter containing menaces without reasonable and probable cause. It was proved that the letters were posted in Russia and received in England, and that the defendant was in Hungary when he gave the letters to an agent to be posted.

In two cases the question has arisen whether acts initiated in England, but taking effect abroad, could be regarded as constituting offences against English law, or against the law of the country in which the act took effect. In R. v. Holmes (x) the indictment was in respect of false pretences contained in a letter posted in Nottingham, addressed to G. in France, by means of which G. was induced to send from France to Nottingham a draft which the prisoner there cashed. The decision was based on R. v. Burdett (ante, p. 54), and no attention was called to the distinction drawn by Wright, J., in R. v. Ellis (supra) to the difference between venue and jurisdiction (y). The case can be maintained on the ground that the draft was received in Nottingham by means of the pretence (z). In R. v. Nillins (a) N., being in Southampton, wrote and sent to Germany letters alleged to contain false pretences, and addressed to persons carrying on business in Germany, and thereby induced them to deliver goods to his order to persons in Hamburg. N. also sent to persons in Germany cheques alleged to be forged. An application was made for his extradition to Germany in respect of the false pretences and forgery. On proceedings for habeas corpus to prevent extradition, it was argued for the Crown that there was ample evidence of an offence committed in Germany, and that N. fell within the definition of fugitive criminal in the Extradition Act, 1870, sect. 26. Cave, J., said, 'It is clear that there may be cases where a person has committed a crime in a foreign country without ever being there (b). This decision, if of sufficient authority, states a principle equally applicable to criminal acts taking effect in England done by persons in foreign countries by means of the post.

In the case of a crime committed through an innocent agent, e.g., where a messenger is sent to cash a forged cheque, or a packet containing poison, or where a letter containing false pretences or threats, or a defamatory libel is sent through the post, the person who employs the agent or the post office in aid of his criminal purpose is treated as the principal offender (c). Where the offence is committed in England or within the Admiralty jurisdiction, the principal offender is regarded as constructively present where the cheque was uttered, or the poison or letter delivered, though he would apparently be equally triable by the Court having jurisdiction in respect of the place where the crime was set in motion. In R. v. Brisac (d) Grose, J., said: 'In the present case the delivering the vouchers, &c. (e), to the commissioners of the victualling office in Middlesex were the acts of both the defendants done in the county of Middlesex. I say it was their acts done by them both: for the persons who innocently delivered the vouchers were mere instruments in their hands for that purpose; the crime of presenting the vouchers was exclusively their own, as the crime of administering poison through the medium of a person ignorant of its quality would be the crime of the person procuring it to be administered.'

In R. v. Taylor (f) Pigott, B., said that if a person in a foreign country set other persons in motion as his agents, by whom a forged cheque was prescribed by his procurement in England, this would be an uttering for which he might be convicted in England.

In R. v. Coombes (g) it was held that the killing of a sailor in a boat by a shot fired from the shore was cognisable in the Admiralty jurisdiction. The reasons for the conclusion are not stated, and the opinion of the judges was that the prisoner was tried by a competent jurisdiction, not that the common-law Courts would not have had concurrent jurisdiction to try the offence (h).

It would seem that the above rule is equally applicable where the post is used by a person abroad for the transmission of letters containing matter which may be the subject of criminal proceedings (i).

It cannot be said that the authorities above cited show that any complete and effective consideration has been judicially given to the questions under discussion: but the trend of the decisions supports the statement in Wharton's Conflict of Laws (2nd ed.) s. 823, that 'the prevailing opinion in England and the United States is that a person who, when abroad, is concerned in directing a crime, may be punished for the same if arrested (or found) where the crime was committed, although he was at the time of commission and concoction out of the latter's jurisdiction' (j), and this view is supported by R. v. Stoddart (k). The indictment inter alia contained charges of obtaining money by false pretences, with reference to a coupon competition. Postal orders and letters containing money were in consequence of the advertisement of the competition posted in London addressed to Middelburg in Holland. It was contended that the obtaining of the money was in Holland and that there was no jurisdiction to try the charges at the Central Criminal Court. The contention was overruled on the ground that the offence was complete on the posting of the letters in London (l).

Where an intelligent acting agent is interposed between the foreigner initiating the crime and its commission in England, difficulties may arise as to the jurisdiction of the English Courts over the foreigner (m).

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION.

Common Law Jurisdiction.—The common law jurisdiction as to crimes is still operative, notwithstanding the Code, and even in cases provided for by the Code, unless there is such repugnancy as to give prevalence to the later law. R. v. Cole, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 330.

Application of Criminal Law of England.—

- (1) To Ontario. Code sec. 10.
- (2) To British Columbia. Code sec. 11.
- (3) To Manitoba. Code sec. 12.
- (4) To Quebec:—

The Quebec Act, 1774.—The Criminal Law of England was introduced into the Province of Quebec by Royal Proclamation in 1763, and subsequently extended by 14 Geo. III. ch. 83 (Imp.) to what is now Ontario. After the erection of Upper Canada, now Ontario, into a separate province, the Provincial Legislature, after reciting the Imperial Act, 14 Geo. III. ch. 83, passed 40 Geo. III. ch. 81, in July, 1800, enacted that the Criminal Law of England as it stood on the 17th September, 1792, should be the Criminal Law of Upper Canada. R. v. Malloy (1900), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 116 (Ont.).

- (5) To Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island:—

The preamble to the Nova Scotia statute, 33 Geo. II. ch. 3 (1759), declares “that this Province of Nova Scotia, or Acadia, and the property thereof, did always of right belong to the Crown of England, both in priority of discovery and ancient possession.” At that time Nova Scotia included New Brunswick, but not Cape Breton, but Cape Breton was ceded to Great Britain in 1763, and subsequently became a part of the Province of Nova Scotia. Prince Edward Island was also ceded to Great Britain in 1763, and annexed to Nova Scotia, but became a separate province in 1769. All the common law of England in 1758, unless obviously inconsistent with surrounding circumstances is in force in the territory which then constituted Nova Scotia. No statute law of England in 1758 is in force in the said territory unless obviously applicable to the circumstances of the territory.

(6) The North-West Territories:—

The North-West Territories Act, R.S.C. ch. 62, sec. 12, enacts as follows: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the laws of England relating to civil and criminal matters, as the same existed on the 15th day of July, 1870, shall be in force in the Territories, in so far as the same are applicable to the Territories, and in so far as the same have not been, or are not hereafter, as regards the Territories, repealed, altered, varied, modified or affected by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, or of the Parliament of Canada, applicable to the Territories, or by any ordinance of the Territories."

(7) The Yukon Territory:—

By the Yukon Act, R.S.C. ch. 63, sec. 19, it is provided: "Subject to the provisions of this Act the laws relating to civil and criminal matters and the Ordinances in force in the North-West Territories on the 13th day of June, 1898, shall be and remain in force in the (Yukon) Territory, in so far as the same are applicable thereto, and in so far as the same have not been or are not hereafter repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada, or by any ordinance of the Governor in Council or the Commissioner in Council made under the provisions of this Act."

Offences on Land Outside Canada.—Issue of warrant by justice. Code sec. 656. By Code sec. 307, sub-sec. 4, no person shall be liable to be convicted of bigamy in respect of having gone through a form of marriage in a place not in Canada, unless such person, being a British subject resident in Canada, leaves Canada with intent to go through such form of marriage.

The Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction to constitute the leaving of Canada by a British subject resident therein, with intent to perform a prohibitive act, an indictable offence, upon the act itself being performed. Re Bigamy Sections of the Code (1897), 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 172; R. v. Brierly, 14 O.R. 525; see R. v. Plowman, 25 O.R. 656.

A British subject domiciled in Canada, only temporarily absent, continues to owe to His Majesty in relation to his government of Canada an obligation to refrain from the completion, whilst absent without any animus manendi, of a prohibited act, a material part of which is done by him in Canada. 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 172.

General Jurisdiction of Courts Within Province.—Code sec. 577.

Offences Committed in One Province are not Triable in Another.—Code sec. 888.

Transitory Offences—

On Water Between Jurisdictions.—Code sec. 584(a).

Begun in One Magisterial Jurisdiction and Completed in Another.—Code sec. 584(b).

On Mail, Vehicle or Vessel Passing Through Several Jurisdictions.—Code sec. 584(c).

Section 584, sub-sec. c, of the Code, is practically a reproduction of section 13 of the Criminal Law Act, 1826 (7 Geo. IV. ch. 54), with the distinction that the Code includes offences committed “on or in respect to mails or a person conveying a post letter bag, post letter, or anything conveyed by post.”

Summons or Warrant May Issue.—Code sec. 653.

Where the accused was arrested for an offence alleged to have been committed in another province in respect of which a warrant of arrest had been there issued and notified by telegram to the Police Department at the place of arrest, the accused is not entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus in respect of the irregularity of his arrest, if the original warrant in due form and duly endorsed is returned in answer to the writ. The King v. Lee Chu, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 322.

Preliminary Inquiry When Offence Committed Outside of Jurisdiction of Justice.—Code sec. 665.

Whenever the accused has been sent for trial by a magistrate or justice of the peace before the Court in any district of the same province, the Court sitting in such district has jurisdiction to try the accused. R. v. Hogle, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 53. See Code secs. 653 and 665.

The power conferred on a magistrate under section 665 of ordering the accused person brought before him, charged with an offence committed out of his territorial jurisdiction (but over which the magistrate still has jurisdiction because of the arrest of the accused within his district), to be taken before some justice having jurisdiction in the place where the offence was committed is permissive only. The Queen v. Burke, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 29.

A magistrate may hold a preliminary inquiry in respect of an indictable offence committed in the same province outside of his territorial jurisdiction, if the accused is, or is suspected to be, within the limits over which such magistrate has jurisdiction, or resides or is suspected of residing within such limits. R. v. Burke, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 29; Code sec. 653.

The general rule is that the magistrate or justice of the peace has jurisdiction either by reason of the residence or presence of the accused in his district, or by reason of the commission of the offence within its limits. There is, however, an enlargement of this general rule in sec. 653, whereby, when an offence is begun in one magisterial jurisdiction, and completed within another, such offence may be considered as having been committed in either of them. R. v. Hogle, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 53.

Where the offence charged was the making, circulation and publishing of false statements of the financial position of a company, and it appeared that the statements were mailed from a place in Ontario to the parties intended to be deceived in Montreal, the offence, although commenced in Ontario, is completed in the Province of Quebec by the delivery of the letters to the parties to whom they were addressed. R. v. Gillespie (No. 2), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 309.

In such case the Courts of the Province of Quebec have jurisdiction to try the accused if he has been duly committed for trial by a magistrate of the district. Ibid.

The offence of fraudulent conversion of the proceeds of a valuable security consists of a continuity of acts—the reception of the valuable security, the collection of the proceeds, the conversion of the proceeds, and lastly the failure to account for them; and where the beginning of the operation is in one district, and the continuation and completion is in another district, the accused may be proceeded against in either district. R. v. Hogle, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 53.

Offences Within Jurisdiction of the Admiralty.—Code sec. 591.

A charge against a seaman not a British subject on a British ship for inciting a revolt upon the ship while on the high seas, cannot if taken only under Code sec. 138, be made without the consent of the Governor-General under sec. 591 obtained prior to the laying of the information. But per Ritchie, J.—If the proceedings for the offence are taken under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (Imp.), sec. 686, the consent of the Governor-General is not required, and Code sec. 591 would not apply. Per Weatherbe, J.—Code sec. 591 applies to the procedure in Canadian Courts in respect of offences committed within the Admiralty jurisdiction whether the proceedings are taken under the Criminal Code or the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act or the Admiralty Offence Act, 1849 (Imp.). The King v. Heckman, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 242 (N.S.).

A foreign seaman on a British ship cannot be summarily convicted for insubordination under the Canada Shipping Act, R.S.C. (1906) ch. 113, sec. 287, unless leave to lay the information has been granted by the Governor-General under sec. 591 of the Code. R. v. Adolph (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 413.

Under the Imperial statutes, 12-13 Vict. ch. 96, and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 686, any offence committed upon the sea or within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, shall, in any British colony where the person is charged with the offence or brought there for trial, be dealt with as if it had been committed within the limits of the local jurisdiction of the Courts of criminal jurisdiction of such colony; and if any person dies in any colony in consequence of having been feloniously hurt or poisoned upon the sea, or within the limits of the Admiralty, or at any place out of the colony, the offence may be dealt with in such colony as if it had been wholly committed there.

A sea harbour enclosed within headlands such as the harbour of Halifax, is within the body of the adjacent county, and criminal offences committed in such harbour even upon foreign ships are not within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty except in the special cases provided by statute. R. v. Schwab (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 539 (N.S.).

A charge of theft by foreigners upon and from a foreign ship while lying in a harbour forming part of the body of the county may be prosecuted in the county without obtaining the leave of the Governor-General under sec. 591 of the Code. Ibid.

A preliminary inquiry may be begun in respect of an indictable offence committed by a foreigner on a British ship within the three mile limit without first obtaining the leave of the Governor-General under Code sec. 591 and the accused may be remanded for the purpose of obtaining the leave of the Governor-General for the trial and punishment of the accused.

The Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878 (Imp.), from which Code sec. 591 is derived, applies, and the phrase "proceedings for the trial of the offence" used in Code sec. 591 must be construed in accordance to the statutory limitation which section 4 of the Imperial statute provides. The King v. Tano, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 440.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

OF CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY.

IT is a general rule that no person is excused from punishment for disobedience to the laws of England, unless he is expressly exempted by law(a). The several pleas and excuses which may be urged on behalf of a person who has committed a forbidden act, as grounds of exemption from punishment, are now usually described as general exceptions, as being implied in the definition of every crime unless the contrary is expressed(b).

It is the general practice of the legislature to leave unexpressed some of the mental elements of crime. In all cases whatever, competent age, sanity, and some degree of freedom from some kind of coercion are assumed to be essential to criminality, but I do not believe that they are ever introduced into any statute by which any particular crime is defined(c). This principle was early expressed by laying down that a statute making a new felony did not extend to an infant under the age of discretion or to a lunatic(d).

The four general exceptions now recognised are—

I. Infancy. II. Unsoundness of mind. III. Subjection to the power of others. IV. Ignorance and mistake of fact.

I. Infancy.—The full age of man or woman by the law of England is twenty-one years(e).

Under seven.—Under the law of England(f) a child under seven years of age cannot be guilty of any criminal offence, whatever evidence may be available of his possessing a mischievous discretion; for ex præsumptione juris he ‘has not discretion and understanding’(g); and the presumption cannot be rebutted(h). In consequence of this rule it has been held illegal to arrest a child under seven found stealing wood(i).

(e) See Co. Litt. ss. 104, 259.

(f) The civil law, as to capital punishments, distinguished the ages into four ranks: 1. Ætas pubertatis plena, which is eighteen years. 2. Ætas pubertatis, or pubertas generally, which is fourteen to eighteen years, at which time persons were likewise presumed to be doli capaces. 3. Ætas pubertatis proxima; from ten and a half (or, according to some, eleven) to fourteen, during which period the capacitas doli was in the arbitrium of the judge, but the party was not presumed to be doli capax. 4. Infantia, which lasts till seven years, within which age there can be no guilt of a capital offence. 1 Hale, 17-19.

(g) Reniger v. Fogossa, 1 Plowd. 1, 19. The rule is recognised by ss. 10, 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), as amended in 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), s. 128, which provides for the summary trial of children from seven to fourteen years for any indictable offence except homicide.

(h) 1 Hale, 27, 28. 1 Hawk. c. 1, s. 1, n.(1). 4 Bl. Com. 23. For a pardon for homicide granted to a child found to have been under seven at the date of the homicide, see 1 Hale, 27 (ed. 1800), note (e).

(i) Marsh v. Loader, 14 C.B. (N.S.) 535.

Between seven and fourteen.—A child of seven and under fourteen is presumed to be incapable of criminal intent (doli incapax); but the presumption may be rebutted, and weakens with the advance of the child's years towards fourteen, and the particular facts and circumstances attending the doing of the act and manifesting the extent of the understanding and disposition of the child. The evidence of criminal capacity which is allowed to displace the presumption (expressed in the phrase malitia supplet aetatem) should be strong and clear beyond all doubt and contradiction (j). It is said that in the case of capital crime the law was minute and circumspect, distinguishing with nicety the several degrees of age and discretion, though criminal responsibility depends not so much on years and days as on the delinquent's understanding and judgment (k). There are numerous cases in and before the eighteenth century in which the liability of children under fourteen to conviction and execution for capital felony has been solemnly discussed, and it was laid down that if it appeared to the Court and jury that the child was doli capax he might be convicted and suffer death (l). Under the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 103) sentence of death cannot be passed on or recorded against a person under sixteen; but such children are now rarely if ever put on trial in respect of any of the few felonies which are still capital, although they cannot be summarily tried for homicide (m).

Whenever a person under the age of fourteen is indicted for felony, the proper course is to leave the case to the jury to say whether, at the time of committing the offence, such person had guilty knowledge that he was doing wrong (n). And in a recent case it has been ruled that the mere fact that the child did the acts imputed to him as an offence is not in itself enough to rebut the presumption against criminal responsibility arising from his tender years (o). The presumption against capacity is now applied equally to felony and misdemeanor.

(j) R. v. Vamplew, 3 F. & F. 520.

(k) 4 Bl. Com. 23.

(l) 1 Hale, 25, 27. 4 Bl. Com. 32. See Dean's case, 1 Hale, 25, note (u): execution of a child between eight and nine for burning two barns; sentence to death (respited) of a child of nine for murder. 1 Hale, 27 (see Fitz. Rep. Corone, 57; B. Corone, 133; Dalt. c. 147): and conviction and execution of a child of ten (Spigurnal's case: 1 Hale, 26; Fitz. Rep. Corone, 118) and a girl of thirteen (Alice de Waldeborough's case: 1 Hale, 26): in each case for murder. The fullest discussion of the rules applied in the eighteenth century is in York's case [1748], Post. 70, an indictment of a boy of ten for murdering a girl of five. The boy was sentenced to death and respited until 1757, when he was pardoned on condition of entering the navy. Cf. R. v. Wild, 1 Mood. 452.

(m) 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 10: 52 and 53 Vict. c. 22, s. 2: 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 128 (1).

(n) R. v. Owen, 4 C. & P. 236, Littledale, J. R. v. Smith, 1 Cox, 260, Erle, J. Former editions of this work contain the statement that if an infant apparently wanting discretion be indicted and found guilty of felony the justices themselves may dismiss him without a pardon (Y. B. 35 Hen. VI. 11 & 12); but that this authority must be understood of a reprieve before judgment; or of a case where the jury find the prisoner within the age of seven years, or not of sufficient discretion to judge between good and evil. 1 Hale, 27. 1 Hawk. c. 1, s. 8. They also raise a query whether in any case of an infant convicted by a jury, the judge would take upon himself to dismiss him. It is submitted that the regular course would be to respite execution, and recommend the prisoner for a pardon. Except in case of conviction of murder, these statements are of no present value: the Courts being free in non-capital cases to bind the prisoner to come up for judgment or put him on probation (vide post, p. 227).

(o) R. v. Kershaw, 18 T. L. R. 357, Bucknill, J. In R. v. Carvery [1906], 11 Canada Cr. Cas. 331, it was held that a charge of misdemeanor (perjury) against a boy of ten could not be sustained at common law unless he was conscious of the nature of

The law presumes that a male under fourteen cannot be guilty of rape (p) ; nor of an assault with intent to commit rape (q), nor of carnally knowing a girl under thirteen years of age (r). But, on an indictment for this offence, he may be convicted of indecent assault (s), an offence which may be committed by persons of either sex (ss). This presumption is absolute, and evidence is not admissible to prove that the infant is in fact physically capable of committing any such offence (t). But this presumption is upon the ground of impotency rather than want of discretion ; for he may be a principal in the second degree, as aiding and assisting in rape as well as in other felonies, if it appears by sufficient circumstances that he had a mischievous discretion (u).

Fourteen and over.—An infant of fourteen years and over is presumed to be doli capax, and at common law was regarded as liable to capital punishment as much as a person of full age (v), and a statute declaring acts to be treason or felony extends to infants above fourteen. But they were said to be exempt from punishment in the case of some misdemeanors and non-capital offences (w). The distinctions drawn between the two classes of offence were probably based on a tendency to confuse between the criminal and civil aspects of misdemeanor, and it was recognised that in the case of any notorious breach of the peace, as a riot, battery, or the like, an infant above the age of fourteen is equally responsible as a person of full age (x).

An infant capable of taking the witnesses' oath is punishable for his conduct, and was capable of appreciating that it was wrong. No evidence was given to shew the extent of the boy's intelligence, and the Court declined to presume from the mere commission of the act that the boy knew he was doing wrong. It has been suggested that a plea of guilty should not be accepted in the case of a child under fourteen, and that the Court or jury should require evidence of criminal capacity before convicting such a child. IV. c. 31, s. 1, and now represented by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57) there was a special exception of marriages within the age of consent ; so that if the marriage were above the age of consent, though within the age of twenty-one years, it was not exempted from the penalty. So by 21 Hen. VIII, c. 7 (rep. 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27), concerning felony by servants embezzling their masters' goods delivered to them, there was a special provision that it should not extend to servants under the age of eighteen years, who certainly would have been within the penalty, if above fourteen though under eighteen, unless there had been a special provision to exclude them. And so by 12 Ann. c. 7 (rep. 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27), which made it felony without benefit of clergy to steal goods to the value of 40s. out of a house, though the house were not broken open, apprentices who should rob their masters were especially excepted (see Bac. Abr. Inf. (H.). Co. Lit. 147. 1 Hale, 20, 21, 22).

perjury (y), and an infant may be indicted for cheating with false dice (z), or for larceny as a bailee, since bailment is not a contract but a delivery upon condition (a). An infant is not liable to indictment as a bankrupt for offence within the Debtors Act, 1869, as extended by the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 and 1890, because he cannot be adjudicated bankrupt (b), but there seems to be no legal objection to his conviction for aiding and abetting an adult bankrupt to commit such offences (c).

In the following cases the criminal liability of an infant between fourteen and twenty-one is said to be qualified. It was said that general statutes imposing corporal punishment did not extend to infants: and on this reasoning it was held that an infant could not be imprisoned for ravishment of ward, notwithstanding the generality of the terms of the Statute of Merton (20 Hen. III. c. 6) (d). But this, if in any sense true, must be limited to cases in which the punishment is collateral to the offence, and not the direct object of the proceeding against the infant (e).

It is said that if an infant of the age of eighteen years be convicted of a disseisin with force, yet he shall not be imprisoned (f); and that though an infant at the age of eighteen or even fourteen, by his own acts may be guilty of a forcible entry, and may be fined for the same, yet he cannot be imprisoned, because his infancy is an excuse by reason of his indiscretion; and it is not particularly mentioned in the statute against forcible entries, that he shall be committed for such fine (g). It is also said that an infant cannot be guilty of a forcible entry or disseisin by barely commanding one or by assenting to one to his use; because every command or assent of this kind by a person under such incapacity is void; but an actual entry by an infant into another's freehold gains the possession and makes him a disseisor (h).

It is also said that if the offence charged against the infant be a mere non-feasance (unless it be of such a thing as the party is bound to by reason of tenure or the like, as to repair a bridge, &c. (i), an infant is privileged by reason of his infancy; because laches in such a case is not imputable to him (j).

It is doubtful whether these authorities would now be followed, except where the contractual incapacity of the infant had a direct bearing on the offence with which he was charged. Recent legislation for purposes of punishment and reform, as distinct from legal responsibility, classifies infants from fourteen to sixteen separately from those between sixteen and twenty-three, and separates both from adults (k).

II. Unsoundness of Mind.—All persons who have reached the age of discretion (14 years) are presumed to be sane, and criminally responsible (l), and in cases where a person subject to attacks of insanity (m) has lucid intervals, the law presumes the offence of such person to have been committed in a lucid interval, unless it appears to have been committed in the time of his distemper (n). It lies on the accused to prove that he was insane at the time of the commission of an offence (o), so as not to be liable to punishment as a sane person. The jury may draw the inference of insanity from direct evidence, or from the appearance and conduct of the accused at his arraignment or trial.

It has been considered, that there are four kinds of persons who may be said to be non compotes mentes :—1. An idiot. 2. One made non compos by illness. 3. A lunatic. 4. One who is drunk (p).

Idiocy is congenital imbecility or unsoundness of mind (q), (without lucid intervals) (r). A person is deemed an idiot who cannot count twenty, tell the days of the week, does not know his father or mother, his own age, &c. : but these are mentioned as instances only ; for whether idiot or not is a question of fact for the jury (s). A person deaf and dumb from birth is in presumption of law an idiot ; but if it appears that he has the use of understanding he is criminally responsible, and may be tried and convicted, though great caution should be used in such a proceeding (t). This form of mental incapacity has been described as dementia naturalis. The difficulty in cases of deaf and dumb persons accused of crime is oftener as to their capacity to plead and understand the proceedings at their trial than their mental incapacity (u).

IV. 2, if a prisoner stands mute, it shall be inquired whether it be wilful, or by the act of God ; whence Crompton infers that if it be by the act of God, the party shall not suffer, Crompt. Just. 29, a. But if one who is both deaf and dumb can show by signs that he has the use of his understanding, much more may one who is only dumb, and consequently such a one may be guilty of felony.' From the humane exertions of many ingenious persons, and from the charitable institutions for the instruction of deaf mutes, many of them have at the present day a very perfect knowledge of right and wrong. In R. v. Steel, 1 Leach, 451, a prisoner, who could not hear, and could not be prevailed upon to plead, was found mute by the visitation of God, and then tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be transported.

(u) In R. v. Jones, 1 Leach, 102, where the prisoner (who was indicted on 12 Ann. c. 7, for stealing in a dwelling-house), on being put to the bar appeared to be deaf and dumb, and the jury found a verdict, 'Mute by the visitation of God ;' after which a woman was examined upon her oath, to the fact of her being able to make him understand what others said, which she said she could do by means of signs, such prisoner was arraigned, tried, and convicted of the simple larceny. In R. v. Berry, 1 Q.B.D. 447, a deaf mute on trial for felony was found by the jury not to have understood the proceedings at the trial, and to be unable to understand them. This was held equivalent to a verdict of insanity. As to present procedure, vide post, p. 82.

(fever or palsy), or accident, injury, or shock to the brain, makes the person suffering from it not criminally responsible for acts done by him while it continues, is described by the older writers as dementia accidentalis vel adventitia, and is separately regarded as total or partial, or temporary (v) or permanent. They describe as lunatics persons afflicted by mental disorder only at certain periods and vicissitudes; having intervals of reason. Such persons during their frenzy are criminally as irresponsible as those whose disorder is fixed and permanent (w).

The great difficulty in cases of this kind is to determine whether a person is so far deprived of sound memory and understanding as not to be responsible for his actions; or whether, notwithstanding some defects of this kind, he still appears to have so much reason and understanding as will make him accountable for his actions. Hale says that partial insanity is the condition of very many, especially melancholy persons, who for the most part discover their defect in excessive fears and griefs, and yet are not wholly destitute of the use of reason; and that this partial insanity seems not to excuse them in the committing of any capital offence. And further, 'Doubtless most persons that are felons of themselves and others are under a degree of partial insanity when they commit these offences: it is very difficult to define the invisible line that divides perfect and partial insanity; but it must rest upon circumstances duly to be weighed and considered both by the judge and jury, lest on the one side there be a kind of inhumanity towards the defects of human nature, or, on the other side, too great an indulgence given to great crimes.' He concludes, 'the best measure I can think of is this: such a person as, labouring under melancholy distempers, hath yet ordinarily as great understanding as ordinarily a child of fourteen years hath, is such a person as may be guilty of treason or felony (x).

On the trial of Earl Ferrers in 1760 for murder (y), it was proved that he was occasionally insane, and incapable from his insanity of knowing what he did, or judging of the consequences of his actions. But the murder was deliberate; and it appeared that when he committed the crime he had capacity sufficient to form a design and know its consequences. It was urged, on the part of the prosecution, that complete possession of reason was unnecessary to warrant the judgment of the law, and that it was sufficient if the party had such possession of reason as enabled him to comprehend the nature of his actions, and discriminate between moral good and evil. And he was found guilty and executed.

In Arnold's case (a), a trial in 1724, for maliciously shooting, it appeared clearly that the prisoner was, to a certain extent, deranged, and that he had greatly misconceived the conduct of Lord Onslow; but it also appeared that he had formed a regular design, and prepared the proper means for carrying it into effect. Tracey, J., told the jury, that where a person has committed a great offence, the exemption of insanity must be very clearly made out before it is allowed ; that it is not every kind of idle and frantic humour of a man, or something unaccountable in his actions, which will show him to be such a madman as is to be exempted from punishment ; but that where a man is totally deprived of his understanding and memory, and does not know what he is doing, any more than an infant, or a wild beast, he will properly be exempted from the punishment of the law.

In Parker's case (b), who was tried in 1812, for aiding the King's enemies, by entering into the French service in time of war between France and this country, the defence was rested upon the ground of insanity ; and a witness on his behalf stated, that his general character from a child was that of a person of very weak intellect ; so weak that it excited surprise in the neighbourhood when he was accepted for a soldier. But the evidence for the prosecution had shown the act to have been done with considerable deliberation and possession of reason ; and that the prisoner, who was a marine, having been captured by the French, after a confinement of about six weeks entered voluntarily into the French service, and stated to a captive comrade that it was much more agreeable to be at liberty and have plenty of money than remain confined in a dungeon. The Attorney-General replied to this defence of insanity, that before it could have any weight in rebutting a charge so clearly made out, the jury must be properly satisfied that at the time when the crime was committed the prisoner did not really know right from wrong.

T. Bowler (c) was tried on July 2, 1812, for wounding W. B. The defence set up for the prisoner was insanity, occasioned by epilepsy ; and it was deposed by the prisoner's housekeeper, that he was seized with an epileptic fit on July 9, 1811, and was brought home apparently lifeless, since which time she had perceived a great alteration in his conduct and demeanor ; that he would frequently rise at nine o'clock in the morning, eat his meat almost raw, and lie on the grass exposed to the rain ; and that his spirits were so dejected that it was necessary to watch him, lest he should destroy himself. The keeper of a lunatic asylum deposed, that it was characteristic of insanity occasioned by epilepsy for the patient to imbibe violent antipathies against particular individuals, even his dearest friends, and to have a desire of taking vengeance upon them upon causes wholly imaginary, which no persuasion could remove, and that yet the patient might be rational and collected upon every other subject. He had no doubt of the insanity of the prisoner, and said he could not be deceived by assumed appearances. A commission of lunacy was also produced, dated June 17, 1812, and an inquisition taken upon it, whereby the prisoner was found insane, and to have been so from March 30. Le Blanc, J., told the jury, that it was for them to determine whether the prisoner, when he committed the offence with which he stood charged, was incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, or under the influence of any illusion in respect of the prosecutor which rendered his mind at the moment insensible of the nature of the act he was about to commit; since in that case he would not be legally responsible for his conduct. On the other hand, provided they should be of opinion that when he committed the offence he was capable of distinguishing right from wrong, and not under the influence of such an illusion as disabled him from discerning that he was doing a wrong act, he would be amenable to the justice of his country, and guilty in the eye of the law. The jury, after considerable deliberation, pronounced the prisoner guilty (d).

In Bellingham's case (e), who was tried in 1812 for the murder of Mr. Spencer Perceval, a part of the prisoner's defence was insanity. On this part of the case, Sir James Mansfield, C.J., stated to the jury, that in order to support such a defence it ought to be proved by the most distinct and unquestionable evidence that the prisoner was incapable of judging between right and wrong; that in fact it must be proved beyond all doubt, that at the time he committed the atrocious act with which he stood charged, he did not consider that murder was a crime against the laws of God and nature; and that there was no other proof of insanity which would excuse murder, or any other crime. That in the species of madness called lunacy, where persons are subject to temporary paroxysms, in which they are guilty of acts of extravagance, such persons committing crimes when they are not affected by the malady would be, to all intents and purposes, amenable to justice; and that so long as they could distinguish good from evil they would be answerable for their conduct. And that in the species of insanity in which the patient fancies the existence of injury, and seeks an opportunity of gratifying revenge by some hostile act, if such a person be capable in other respects of distinguishing right from wrong, there would be no excuse for any act of atrocity which he might commit under this description of derangement.

In R. v. Offord (f), on an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner laboured under a notion that the inhabitants of H., and particularly the deceased, were continually issuing warrants against him with intent to deprive him of his liberty and life. Lord Lyndhurst, C.B., told the jury that 'they must be satisfied, before they could acquit the prisoner on the ground of insanity, that he did not know, when he committed the act, what the effect of it, if fatal, would be, with reference to the crime of murder. The question was, did he know that he was committing an offence against the laws of God and nature?' and expressed his complete agreement with the observations of Sir James Mansfield in the last case.

On the trial of Oxford, in 1840, for shooting at Queen Victoria, Lord Denman, C.J., told the jury, 'Persons prima facie must be taken to be of sound mind till the contrary is shewn. But a person may commit a criminal act, and not be responsible. If some controlling disease was, in truth, the acting power within him which he could not resist, then he will not be responsible. It is not more important than difficult to lay down the rule by which you are to be governed.' . . . 'On the part of the defence, it is contended that the prisoner was non compos mentis, that is (as it has been said) unable to distinguish right from wrong, or, in other words, that from the effect of a diseased mind he did not know at the time that the act he did was wrong.' . . . 'Something has been said about the power to contract and to make a will; but I think that those things do not supply any test. The question is, whether the prisoner was labouring under that species of insanity which satisfies you that he was quite unaware of the nature, character, and consequences of the act he was committing, or, in other words, whether he was under the influence of a diseased mind, and was really unconscious at the time he was committing the act that it was a crime?' (g)

J. Hadfield was tried in the Court of King's Bench, in 1800 (h), for high treason, in shooting at King George III., and the defence was insanity. He had been a soldier and received many severe wounds in battle, which had caused partial derangement of mind, and had been dismissed from the army on account of insanity. Since his return to this country he had been annually out of his mind from the beginning of spring to the end of the dog-days, and had been under confinement as a lunatic. When affected by his disorder, he imagined himself to hold intercourse with God; sometimes called himself God, or Jesus Christ, and used other expressions of the most blasphemous kind; and also committed acts of the greatest extravagance; but at other times he appeared to be rational, and discovered no symptom of mental incapacity or disorder. On May 11, 1800, preceding his commission of the act in question, his mind was very much disordered, and he used many blasphemous expressions. At one or two o'clock on the following morning, he suddenly jumped out of bed, and alluding to his child, a boy of eight months old, of whom he was usually remarkably fond, said he was about to dash his brains out against the bedpost, and that God had ordered him to do so; and upon his wife screaming, and his friends coming in, he ran into a cupboard and declared he would lie there, it should be his bed, and God had said so; and when doing this, having upset some water, he said he had lost a great deal of blood. On the same and the following day he used many incoherent and blasphemous expressions. On the morning of May 15 he seemed worse, said that he had seen God in the night, that the coach was waiting, and that he had been to dine with the King. He spoke very highly of the King, the royal family, and particularly of the Duke of York. He then went to his master's workshop, whence he returned to dinner at two, but said that he stood in no need of meat, and could live without it. He asked for tea between three and four o'clock, and talked of being made a member of the society of Odd Fellows; and, after repeating his irreligious expressions, went out and repaired to the theatre. On the part of the Crown, it was proved that he had sat in his place in the theatre nearly three-quarters of an hour before the King entered ; that at the moment when the audience rose, on His Majesty's entering his box, he got up above the rest, and, taking deliberate aim, presented a pistol loaded with slugs, fired it at the King's person, and then let it drop ; and when he fired his situation appeared favourable for taking aim, for he was standing upon the second seat from the orchestra in the pit ; and he took a deliberate aim, by looking down the barrel, as a man usually does when taking aim. On his apprehension, amongst other expressions, he said that ' he knew perfectly well his life was forfeited ; that he was tired of life, and regretted nothing but the fate of a woman who was his wife, and would be his wife a few days longer, he supposed.' These words he spoke calmly, and without any apparent derangement ; and with equal calmness repeated that he was tired of life, and said that ' his plan was to get rid of it by other means ; he did not intend anything against the life of the King ; he knew the attempt only would answer his purpose.' Erskine (i) for the prisoner put the case to the jury as one of a species of insanity in the nature of a morbid delusion of the intellect, and admitted that it was necessary for them to be satisfied that the act in question was the immediate unqualified offspring of the disease. And Kenyon, C.J., ruled that as the prisoner was deranged immediately before the offence was committed, it was impossible that he had recovered his senses in the interim ; and although, were they to run into nicety, proof might be demanded of his insanity at the precise moment when the act was committed ; yet, there being no reason for believing him to have been at that period a rational and accountable being, he ought to be acquitted (j).

On an indictment of Daniel Macnaughton, in 1843, for the murder of D., the defence was insanity, and the medical evidence was that persons of otherwise sound mind might be affected with morbid delusions ; that the prisoner was in that condition ; that a person labouring under a morbid delusion might have a moral perception of right and wrong ; but that, in the case of the prisoner, it was a delusion which carried him away beyond the power of his own control, and left him no such perception ; and that he was not capable of exercising any control over acts which had a connection with his delusion ; that it was the nature of his disease to go on gradually until it had reached a climax, when it burst forth with irresistible intensity ; that a man might go on for years quietly, though at the same time under its influence, but would at once break out into the most violent paroxysms. Tindal, C.J., said to the jury, ' The point I shall have to submit to you is whether on the whole of the evidence you have heard, you are satisfied that at the time the act for the commission of which the prisoner now stands charged he had that competent use of his understanding as that he knew that he was doing, by the very act itself, a wicked and a wrong thing. If he was not sensible at the time he committed that act, that it was a violation of the law of God and man (k), undoubtedly he is not responsible for that act, or liable to any punishment whatever flowing from it.' . . . ' If upon balancing the evidence in your minds you should think the prisoner a person capable of distinguishing right from wrong with respect to the act with which he stands charged (l). he is then a responsible agent and liable to the penalties imposed upon those who commit the crime of which he is accused' (m).

Macnaughton was acquitted on the ground of insanity, and his acquittal gave rise to a discussion in the House of Lords, and the following questions were put to the judges (n), and answered by them all, except Maule, J., as follows, in June, 1843 :—

Q. I. 'What is the law respecting alleged crimes committed by persons afflicted with insane delusion in respect of one or more particular subjects or persons; as, for instance, where, at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, the accused knew he was acting contrary to law, but did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some supposed public benefit?'¹

A. I. 'Assuming that your lordships' inquiries are confined to those persons who labour under such partial delusions only, and are not in other respects insane, we are of opinion that notwithstanding the accused did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable, according to the nature of the crime committed, if he knew at the time of committing such crime that he was acting contrary to law, by which expression we understand your lordships to mean the law of the land.'

Q. II. 'What are the proper questions to be submitted to the jury where a person alleged to be afflicted with insane delusion respecting one or more particular subjects or persons, is charged with the commission of a crime (murder, for example), and insanity is set up as a defence?'

Q. III. 'In what terms ought the question to be left to the jury as to the prisoner's state of mind, at the time when the act was committed?'

A. II. and III. 'As these two questions appear to us to be more conveniently answered together, we submit our opinion to be that the jury ought to be told in all cases that every man is to be presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction; and that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity it must be clearly proved that, at the time of committing the act, the accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong. The mode of putting the latter part of the question to the jury on these occasions has generally been, whether the accused at the time of doing the act knew the difference between right and wrong (o) ; which mode, though rarely, if ever, leading to any mistake with the jury, is not, as we conceive, so accurate when put generally and in the abstract, as when put with reference to the party's knowledge of right and wrong, in respect to the very act with which he is charged. If the question were to be put as to the knowledge of the accused solely and exclusively with reference to the law of the land, it might tend to confound the jury, by inducing them to believe that an actual knowledge of the law of the land was essential in order to lead to a conviction : whereas, the law is administered upon the principle that every one must be taken conclusively to know it, without proof that he does know it. If the accused was conscious that the act was one that he ought not to do, and if that act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable ; and the usual course, therefore, has been to leave the question to the jury, whether the accused had a sufficient degree of reason to know that he was doing an act that was wrong ; and this course we think is correct, accompanied with such observations and explanations as the circumstances of each particular case may require' (p).

Q. IV. ' If a person under an insane delusion as to existing facts commits an offence in consequence thereof, is he thereby excused ? '

A. IV. ' The answer must, of course, depend on the nature of the delusion ; but making the same assumption as we did before, namely, that he labours under such partial delusion only, and is not in other respects insane, we think he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real. For example, if, under the influence of his delusion, he supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take away his life, and he kills that man, as he supposes, in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment. If his delusion was that the deceased had inflicted a serious injury to his character and fortune, and he killed him in revenge for such supposed injury, he would be liable to punishment.'

Q. V. ' Can a medical man, conversant with the disease of insanity, who never saw the prisoner previously to the trial, but who was present during the whole trial, and the examination of the witnesses, be asked his opinion as to the state of the prisoner's mind at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, or his opinion whether the prisoner was conscious at the time of doing the act that he was acting contrary to law, or whether he was labouring under any, and what, delusion at the time ? '

S.) 497, by Campbell, Att.-Gen., it is said, that ' to amount to a complete bar of punishment, either at the time of committing the offence, or of the trial, the insanity must have been of such a kind as entirely to deprive the prisoner of the use of reason, as applied to the act in question, and the knowledge that he was doing wrong in committing it. If, though somewhat deranged, he is able to distinguish right from wrong, in his own case, and to know that he was doing wrong in the act which he committed, he is liable to the full punishment of his criminal acts.' A. V. 'We think the medical man, under the circumstances supposed, cannot, in strictness, be asked his opinion in the terms above stated, because each of those questions involves the determination of the truth of the facts deposed to, which it is for the jury to decide, and the questions are not questions upon a mere matter of science, in which case such evidence is admissible. But where the facts are admitted, or not disputed, and the question becomes substantially one of science only, it may be convenient to allow the question to be put in that general form, though the same cannot be insisted on as a matter of right' (g).

In R. v. Vaughan (r) the prisoner, who was charged with stealing a cow, had had his cow taken from him under an illegal distress, and, with a view of recovering her, he had gone in the night to the close of the prosecutor, who had purchased her, and taken another cow out of it. Owing to the loss of his cow, and various other losses, the prisoner's mind

(g) 1 C. & K. 130, 10 C. & F. 200. Maule, J., after expressing the difficulty he felt in answering the questions, because they did not arise out of, and were not put with reference to, a particular case, or for a particular purpose, which might limit or explain the generality of their terms, said, in answer to the first question, 'So far as it comprehends the question whether a person circumstanced as stated in the question is for that reason only to be found not guilty of a crime respecting which the question of his guilt has been duly raised in a criminal proceeding, and I am of opinion that he is not. There is no law that I am aware of that makes persons in the state described in the question not responsible for their criminal acts. To render a person irresponsible for crime on account of unsoundness of mind the unsoundness should, according to the law as it has been long understood and held, be such as to render him incapable of knowing right from wrong. The terms used in the question cannot be said (with reference only to the usage of language) to be equivalent to a description of this kind and degree of unsoundness of mind.' To the second question the learned judge answered, 'If, on a trial such as is suggested in the question, the judge should have occasion to state what kind and degree of insanity would amount to a defence, it should be stated conformably to what I have mentioned in my answer to the first question as being, in my opinion, the law on this subject.' To the third question the learned judge replied, 'There are no terms which the judge is by law required to use. They should not be inconsistent with the law as above stated, but should be such as, in the discretion of the judge, are proper to assist the jury in coming to a right conclusion as to the guilt of the accused.' To the fourth question the learned judge replied that the answer to the first question was applicable to this. To the fifth question the learned judge replied, 'Whether a question can be asked depends, not merely on the questions of fact raised on the record, but on the course of the cause at the time when it is proposed to ask it; and the state of an inquiry as to the guilt of a person charged with a crime, and defended on the ground of insanity may be such that such a question as either of those suggested is proper to be asked and answered, though the witness has never seen the person before the trial, and though he has been present and heard the witnesses; these circumstances of his never having seen the person before, and of his having been present at the trial, not being necessarily sufficient, as it seems to me, to exclude the lawfulness of a question, which is otherwise lawful, though I will not say that an inquiry might not be in such a state as that these circumstances should have such an effect. Supposing there is nothing else in the state of the trial to make the questions suggested proper to be asked and answered, except that the witness had been present and heard the evidence, it is to be considered whether that is enough to sustain the question; in principle it is open to the objection that as the opinion of the witness is founded on those conclusions of fact, which he forms from the evidence, and as it does not appear what these conclusions are, it may be that the evidence he gives is on such an assumption of facts as makes it irrelevant to the inquiry. But such questions have been very frequently asked, and the evidence to which they are directed given, and has never, that I am aware of, been successfully objected to; and I think the course and practice of receiving such evidence, confirmed by the very high authority of Tindal, C.J., Williams, J., and Coleridge, J., in R. v. Macnaughton, who not only received it, but left it, as I understand, to the jury without any remark derogating from its weight, ought to be held to warrant its reception, notwithstanding the objection in principle to which it may be open.'

was affected, and he was under the impression that every one was robbing him. Tindal, C.J., told the jury that it is not mere eccentricity or singularity of manner that will suffice to establish the plea of insanity; it must be shewn that the prisoner 'had no competent use of his understanding, so as to know that he was doing a wrong thing in the particular act in question.'

In R. v. Higginson (s), a trial for murder, by burying a child alive, upon the surgeon, called for the prosecution, being asked whether a fracture of the skull was the cause of the death, or whether the child had, after the fracture of the skull, been suffocated by being buried while alive, the prisoner said, in open court, 'I put him in alive.' Two witnesses stated that the prisoner was of 'very weak intellect,' and the surgeon of the prison stated that the prisoner was of 'very weak intellect but capable of knowing right from wrong.' Maule, J., after adverting to the evidence adduced, said to the jury, 'If you are satisfied that the prisoner committed this offence, but you are also satisfied that, at the time of the committing the offence, the prisoner was so insane that he did not know right from wrong, he should be acquitted on that ground; but if you think that, at the time of committing the offence, he did know right from wrong, he is responsible for his acts, although he is of weak intellect' (t).

In R. v. Stokes (u), upon an indictment for murder it appeared that the prisoner, in the soldiers' room in the barracks, took up his musket as if to clean it, levelled it at the deceased, fired and killed her on the spot; her husband and child being in the room, and two other soldiers being present. The prisoner was a man of singular habits, and seldom spoke to the other soldiers, was very 'secluded, sulky, and sullen,' and was described as 'a close-minded man,' and 'a man of a very nasty temper.' He had frequently complained of illness, and had made efforts to get into the hospital, but he was rejected, as having no visible disorder. (The report contains a statement of sundry other facts as to the prisoner's state of mind.) The defence was that the prisoner was insane, or that he was under such an insane impulse as to render him irresponsible. Rolfe, B., in summing up said: 'If a prisoner seeks to excuse himself upon the plea of insanity, it is for him to make it clear that he was insane at the time of committing the offence charged. The onus rests on him; and the jury must be satisfied that he actually was insane. If the matter be left in doubt, it will be their duty to convict him; for every man must be presumed to be responsible for his acts till the contrary is clearly shewn. A case occurred some time ago at the Central Criminal Court, before Alderson, B., and the jury hesitated as to their verdict, on the ground that they were not satisfied whether the prisoner was or was not of sound mind when he committed the crime; and that learned judge told them, that, unless they were satisfied of his insanity, it would be their duty to find a verdict of guilty. Every man is held responsible for his acts by the law of this country, if he can discern right from wrong. This subject was a few years ago carefully considered by all the judges, and the law is clear upon the subject (v). It is true, that learned speculators, in their writings, have laid it down that men, with a consciousness that they were doing wrong, were irresistibly compelled to commit some unlawful act (w). But who enabled them to dive into the human heart, and see the real motive that prompted the commission of such deeds? It has been urged that no motive has been shown for the commission of this crime. It is true that there is no motive apparently but a very inadequate one; but it is dangerous ground to take, to say that a man must be insane because men fail to discern the motive for his act. It has also been said that the conduct of the prisoner was that of a madman in committing the offence at such a time, in the presence of the woman's husband, who had arms within his reach; but it would be a most dangerous doctrine to lay down, that because a man committed a desperate offence, with the chance of instant death, and the certainty of future punishment before him, he was therefore insane, as if the perpetration of crimes was to be excused by their very atrocity' (x).

In R. v. Barton (y), on the trial of a man for the murder of his wife, it appeared that he had always treated her and their children with kindness; that they were talking with a neighbour at their door late at night, and at four o'clock next morning it was discovered that he had cut the throats of his wife and child, and had attempted to commit suicide. When questioned, he exhibited no sorrow or remorse for his conduct, but stated that 'trouble and dread of poverty and destitution had made him do it, fearing that his wife and child would starve when he was dead.' He said he had contemplated suicide for a week past; he had not had any quarrel with his wife, and that, having got out of bed to destroy himself, the thought had first come into his head to kill his wife and child; he had first attacked her whilst she was asleep in bed; she got away from him, and rushed to the window; he then killed the child, and seizing his wife, pulled her backwards to him, and cut her throat; he next tried to cut his own throat, but his powers failed him, and he did not succeed, though he wounded himself severely. This narrative, coupled with a knowledge of the prisoner's private circumstances, induced the surgeon to form the opinion that the prisoner, at the time he committed the act, had not, in consequence of an uncontrollable impulse, to which all human beings are subject, any control over his conduct. The desire to inflict pain and injury on those previously dear to the prisoner, was in itself a strong symptom of insanity, and the impossibility of resisting a sudden impulse to slay a fellow-being, was another indication that the mind was insane. There was not necessarily a connection between homicidal and suicidal monomania, though it would be more likely that a monomaniac who had contemplated suicide should kill another person, than for one who had not entertained any such feelings of hostility to his own existence. Monomania was an affection, which, for the instant, completely deprived the patient of all self-control in respect of some one particular subject which is the object of the disease. The prisoner had no delusion, and his reasoning faculties did not seem to be affected ; but he had a decided monomania evincing itself in the notion that he was coming to destitution. For that, there was some foundation in fact ; but it was the surgeon's decided opinion that the prisoner was in an unsound state of mind at the moment he cut his wife's throat. On the day before, the prisoner had had his razor sharpened, saying he wanted it to give to some friend ; and the prisoner had suffered a severe pecuniary loss not long before, and it had produced a decided effect upon his mind, giving rise to the most gloomy anticipations on account of his wife and family. Parke, B., told the jury that the only question was whether, at the time the prisoner inflicted the wound on his wife, ' he was in a state of mind to be made responsible to the law for her murder. That would depend upon the question, whether he, at the time, knew the nature and character of the deed he was committing, and, if so, whether he knew he was doing wrong in so acting. This mode of dealing with the defence of insanity had not, he was aware, the concurrence of medical men ; but he must, nevertheless, express his decided concurrence with Rolfe, B.'s views of such cases (z), that learned judge having expressed his opinion that the excuse of an irresistible impulse co-existing with the full possession of reasoning powers might be urged in justification of every crime known to the law—for every man might be said, and truly, not to commit any crime except under the influence of some irresistible impulse. Something more than this was necessary to justify an acquittal on the ground of insanity, and it would therefore be for the jury to say whether, taking into consideration all that the surgeon had said, which was entitled to great weight, the impulse, under which the prisoner had committed this deed, was one which altogether deprived him of the knowledge that he was doing wrong. Could he distinguish between right and wrong ? Reliance was placed on the desire to commit suicide, but that did not always evidence insanity. And here the prisoner was led to attempt his own life by the pressure of a real substantial fact clearly apparent to his perceptive organs, and not by any unsubstantial delusion. The fact, however, must be taken into the account, for it might have had a serious effect on the mind of the prisoner, as also the absence of any attempt to escape from justice, and the want of all sense of sorrow and regret immediately after the death of his wife, contrasted with his more natural state of mind afterwards, when he felt and expressed regret and sorrow for his act. These circumstances ought all to be taken into consideration ; but it was difficult to see how they could establish the plea of insanity in a case where there was a total absence of all delusion ' (a).

In R. v. Burton (b), the prisoner, a youth of eighteen, at first pleaded guilty to an indictment for murder ; the judge warned him that this would not affect his fate ; his counsel said he was insane, and desired to be hung ; the prisoner, however, with apparently perfect intelligence, retracted his plea, and pleaded not guilty. The deceased, a boy, had been found with his throat cut, and the prisoner gave himself up, and admitted the act, recounting all the circumstances with perfect intelligence ; and it did not appear that there was any ill-will to the boy, and the prisoner had said, 'I had no particular ill-feeling against the boy, only I had made up my mind to murder some one.' He added that he had wiped his hands and the knife. Afterwards he said that it was well for a Mr. C. that he had left Chatham, for he had prosecuted him, and he had made up his mind to murder him when he came out of gaol. Evidence was given on behalf of the prisoner of strange conduct, and a surgeon proved that on two occasions he had sent the prisoner's mother to a lunatic asylum: she was low and desponding, and attempted suicide. The prisoner's brother was of weak intellect. On two occasions he had attended the prisoner, and said he believed he was labouring under what, in the profession, would be considered as moral insanity; that is, he knows perfectly well what he is doing, but has no control over himself. By the moral feelings he meant the propensities which may be diseased, while the intellectual faculties are sound; and that, having heard the evidence, in his opinion, it was reasonable to believe that there must in the prisoner's case be some derangement of the brain,—some deviation from the normal condition of the brain. On cross-examination, he stated that he believed the prisoner knew what he was doing, but that an impulse came upon him, which he could not control; and he adopted an opinion of Dr. Winslow that no man could commit suicide in a state of sanity. He believed the prisoner had no proper control over his actions. He had a knowledge of right and wrong, but could not control his actions. Evidence on the part of the Crown was given to shew that the prisoner was sane. Wightman, J., said that 'in Macnaughton's case (c) the judges laid down the rule to be that there must, to raise the defence, be a defect of reason from disease of the mind, so as that the person did not know the nature and quality of the act he committed, or did not know whether it was right or wrong. It was not mere eccentricity of conduct which made a man irresponsible for his acts. The medical man called for the defence had defined homicidal mania to be a propensity to kill, and described moral insanity as a state of mind under which a man, perfectly aware that it was wrong to do so, killed another under an uncontrollable impulse. This seemed to be a most dangerous doctrine, and fatal to the interests of society and security of life. The question was whether such a theory was in accordance with law. The rule, as laid down by the judges, was quite inconsistent with such a view; for it was, that a man was responsible for his actions if he knew the difference between right and wrong. It was urged that the prisoner did the act in order to be hanged, and so was under an insane delusion; but what delusion was he under? So far from it, it showed that he was quite conscious of the nature of the act and its consequences. He was supposed to desire to be hanged, and in order to attain the object committed murder. That might show a morbid state of mind, but not delusion. Homicidal mania, again, as described by the witnesses for the defence, showed no delusion; it merely showed a morbid desire for blood. Delusion meant the belief in what did not exist. The question for the jury was, whether the prisoner at the time he committed the act was labouring under such a species of insanity as to be unaware of the nature, the character, or the consequences of the act he committed. In other words, whether he was incapable of knowing that what he did was wrong.'

In R. v. Townley (d) on an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner had been engaged to the deceased, but her friends disapproved, and the engagement was broken off, but renewed afterwards. However, the deceased formed an attachment for another, and wrote to the prisoner to break off the engagement; and he wrote three very sensible letters in reply to hers, that he would not stand in her way if she was resolved to part with him, but that he should prefer to have an interview with her, and to hear her determination from her own lips. Accordingly he went to the place where she lived, and they were seen together, and she was afterwards found with her throat cut in three places. The prisoner came up and assisted to carry her to the house, repeatedly stating that he had done it, and should be hanged for it. He said also, 'Poor Bessie! you should not have proved false to me.' He told her grandfather, who asked what was amiss, 'It is your granddaughter, Betsy, murdered. She has deceived me, and the woman that deceives me must die.' The prisoner behaved throughout with apparent indifference, and, on the arrival of the police, said that he wished to give himself up for murdering the young lady; and added, 'I am far happier now I have done it than I was before, and I trust she is.' Evidence was given that there had been insanity in the family, and Dr. Winslow stated that he had seen the prisoner. 'I talked to him largely on the subject of the crime, and I am of opinion that at the present moment he is a man of deranged intellect. He told me he did not recognise he had committed any crime at all, neither did he feel any degree of pain, regret, contrition, or remorse for what he had done. I endeavoured to impress on his mind the serious nature of the crime he had committed. He repudiated the idea of its being a crime either against God or man, and attempted to justify the act, alleging that he considered Miss Goodwin as his own property; that she had been illegally wrested from him by an act of violence; that he viewed her in the light of his wife, who had committed an act of adultery; and that he had as perfect a right to deal with her life as he had with any other description of property,—as the money in his pocket, &c. I endeavoured to prove to him the gross absurdity of his statement and the enormity of his offence: he replied, "Nothing short of a miracle can alter my opinions." The expression that Miss Goodwin was his property was frequently repeated. He killed her, he said, to recover property which had been stolen from him. I could not disturb this, as I thought, very insane idea. I said, "Suppose anyone robbed you of a picture, what course would you take to recover it?" He said he would demand its restitution, and if it were not granted, he would take the person's life without compunction. I remarked that he had no right to take the law into his own hands; he should have recourse to legal measures to obtain restitution. He replied that he recognised the right of no man to sit in judgment upon him; he was a free agent; and as he did not bring himself into the world by any action of his own, he had perfect liberty to think and act as he pleased, irrespective of anyone else. I regard these expressions as evidence of a diseased intellect. He said he had been for some weeks under the influence of a conspiracy; there were six conspirators plotting against him, with a view to destroy him, with a chief conspirator at their head. This conspiracy was still going on while he was in prison, and he had no doubt that, if he were at liberty, they would continue their operations against him, and in order to escape their evil purposes he would have to leave the country. He became much excited, and assumed a wild, demoniacal aspect. I am satisfied that aspect was not simulated.' On cross-examination he said, 'I have no doubt he knows that these opinions of his are contrary to those generally entertained, and that, if acted upon, they would subject him to punishment. I should think that he would know that killing a person was contrary to law, and wrong in that sense. I should think, from his saying he should be hanged, that he knew he had done wrong. His moral sense was more vitiated than I ever found that of any other human being. His opinions were pretty much those of atheists, but he was beyond atheism. He seemed incapable of reasoning correctly on any moral subject. He denied the existence of a God and of a future world. He said it was a matter of perfect indifference whether he was dead or alive.' Martin, B., told the jury that what the law meant by an insane man was, a man who acted under delusions, and supposed a state of things to exist which did not exist, and acted thereupon. A man who did so was under a delusion, and a person so labouring was insane. In one species of insanity the patient lost his mind altogether, and had nothing but instinct left. Such a person would destroy his fellow-creatures, as a tiger did his prey, by instinct only. A man in that state had no mind at all, and therefore, was not criminally responsible. The law, however, went farther than that. If a man labouring under a delusion did something of which he did not know the real character—something of the effect and consequences of which he was ignorant—he was not responsible. An ordinary instance of such delusion was where a man fancied himself a king, and treated all around him as his subjects. If such a man were to kill another under the supposition that he was exercising his prerogative as a king, and that he was called upon to execute the other as a criminal, he would not be responsible. The result was, that if the jury believed that at the time the act was committed the prisoner was labouring under a delusion, and believed that he was doing an act that was not wrong, or of which he did not know the consequences, he would be excused. If, on the other hand, he well knew that his act would take away life—that that act was contrary to the law of God, and punishable by the law of the land—he was guilty of murder. In his opinion the law was best laid down by Le Blanc, J., in Bowler's case (e), who told the jury that it was for them to determine whether the prisoner, when he committed the offence, was incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, or under the influence of any illusion which rendered his mind at the moment insensible of the nature of the act he was about to commit; since in that case he would not be legally responsible for his conduct. On the other hand, provided they should be of opinion that when he committed the act he was capable of distinguishing right from wrong, and not under the influence of such an illusion as disabled him from discerning that he was doing a wrong act, he would be amenable to justice. After noticing other cases, Martin, B., told the jury that they must judge of the act by the prisoner's statements and by what he did at the time. Unless they were satisfied—and it was for the prisoner to make it out—that he did not know the consequences of his act, or that it was against the law of God and man, and would subject him to punishment, he was guilty of murder. The prisoner's letters appeared to be as sensible letters as ever he had read. Again, the reason the prisoner gave for his act was, 'She should not have proved false to me.' Now, if his real motive was that he conceived himself to have been ill-used, and either from jealousy of the man who was preferred to him, or from a desire of revenge upon her, committed the act, that would be murder. Those were the very passions which the law required men to control; and if the deed was done under the influence of those passions, there was no doubt it was murder. The prisoner's expression, that he should be hanged for it, indicated that he knew the consequences of his act. Another reason he gave for what he had done was, 'The woman who deceives me must die.' If a young lady promised to marry a man, and then changed her mind, it might be truly said that she deceived him; but what would be the consequences to society if men were to say every woman who treated them in that way should die, and were to carry out those views by cutting their throats? The prisoner claimed to exercise the same power over a wife as he could lawfully exercise over a chattel; but that was not a delusion, nor like a delusion. It was the conclusion of a man, who had arrived at results different from those generally arrived at, and contrary to the laws of God and man; but it was not a delusion. It had been said by one of the witnesses that the prisoner did not know the difference between good and evil. If that was a test of insanity, many men were tried who did not know that difference. In truth, it was no test at all. The idea of a conspiracy was a delusion, but the mere setting himself up against the law of God and man was not a delusion at all. The question for the jury was, Was the prisoner insane, and did he do the act under a delusion, believing it to be other than it was? If he knew what he was doing, and that it was likely to cause death, and was contrary to the law of God and man, and that the law directed that persons who did such acts should be punished, he was guilty of murder.

In R. v. Haynes (f), a trial for murder of a woman, the prisoner appeared to have been on the most intimate terms with the deceased. No motive was assigned for the murder. The prisoner having seduced a young woman under a promise of marriage, which he had been unable to fulfil, his reason had been much affected by it. Bramwell, B., read the opinion of the judges in the House of Lords to the jury, and then said, 'It has been urged that you should acquit the prisoner on the ground that, it being impossible to assign any motive for the perpetration of the offence, he must have been acting under what is called a powerful and irresistible influence, or homicidal tendency. But the circumstances of an act being apparently motiveless, is not a ground from which you can safely infer the existence of such an influence. Motives exist unknown and innumerable, which might prompt the act. A morbid and restless, but resistible, thirst for blood, would itself be a motive urging to such a deed for its own relief (ff). But if an influence be so powerful as to be termed irresistible, so much the more reason is there why we should not withdraw any of the safeguards tending to counteract it. There are three powerful restraints existing, all tending to the assistance of the person who is suffering under such an influence,—the restraint of religion, the restraint of conscience, and the restraint of law. But if the influence itself be held a legal excuse, rendering the crime dispunishable, you at once withdraw a most powerful restraint—that forbidding and punishing its perpetration. We must return, therefore, to the simple question you have to determine—did the prisoner know the nature of the act he was doing, and did he know that he was doing what was wrong? (g)

In R. v. Layton (h), a trial for murder, the prisoner and his wife were walking along a road, and he had been for some time chiding her. He then fired a pistol at her and she fell; and he pulled her up, and they proceeded a few yards, when he pushed her down, and inflicted a second wound on her throat with a knife. He then got over a hedge into a field, and ran some distance, until he was overtaken by a person who had seen the woman fall. The prisoner wiped the blood off his hands, saying he had met with a misfortune and cut his finger. He would not tell what he had done with the pistol and knife, but said, 'I did it. I intended to do it, and that will put an end to it. I have been unhappy since Christmas.' When he shot and cut his wife, he must have known that persons were within a short distance, having just before met them. He had threatened to murder his wife before, and on the day before he was heard sharpening a knife, and the wife was afterwards seen running out of the house, followed by the prisoner with a knife similar to one found near the place where the murder was committed. The prisoner had been in gaol for debt for two months in the early part of the year, and had been unfortunate in building speculations. Several witnesses called for the prisoner stated that they believed that the prisoner was not in his right mind, and proved sundry statements made by him as to his property and other matters, which were alleged to be delusions, and that his conduct had been strange, and his manner greatly excited. For the prosecution, witnesses were called to prove that he was sane, and had acted in matters of business in a rational manner. Rolfe, B., told the jury that insanity was the most difficult question which could engage the attention of any tribunal. It was difficult to define it in words, or even in idea. The opinion of the judges was taken by the House of Lords a few years back, as to what was to constitute a definition of insanity, and it created very great difficulty, but after great and anxious deliberation, they came to the conclusion that the old description was the best, viz., that insanity should constitute a defence only when a party was in such a state of mind arising from disease as to be incapable of deciding between right and wrong; but that this definition was imperfect, as all definitions must be, and would require to be modified with reference to each particular case. Applying that law to the present case, what the jury had to consider was, whether the evidence was such as to satisfy them that at the time the act was committed by the prisoner, he was incapable of understanding right from wrong, as that he could not appreciate the nature of the act he was committing. Perhaps it would be going too far to say that a party was responsible in every case where he had a glimmering knowledge of what was right and wrong. In cases of this description, there was one cardinal rule which should never be departed from, viz., the burden of proving innocence rested on the accused. Every man committing an outrage on the person or property of another, must be, in the first instance, taken to be a responsible being. Such a presumption was necessary for the security of mankind. A man going about the world, marrying, dealing, and acting as if he were sane, must be presumed to be sane till he proves the contrary. The question, therefore, would be, not whether the prisoner was of sound mind, but whether he had made out to their satisfaction that he was not of sound mind. They might arrive at the conclusion, from the nature of his conduct and acts up to the time of the act in question, or shortly preceding it, that he was insane; though he was not capable of proving it by positive testimony, as such was the nature of the mind, that it might be one minute sane, and the next insane, and therefore it might be impossible for a party to give positive evidence of its condition at the particular moment in question. The conclusion seemed irresistible, that the prisoner was to some extent labouring under a delusion, but he was not exempt from responsibility because he was labouring under a delusion as to his property, unless that had the effect of making him incapable of understanding the wickedness of murdering his wife. But when that was the question they had to consider, he could not say that it was altogether immaterial that he was insane on one point only (i). Indeed his insanity on that point might guide them to a conclusion as to his sanity on the point involved in this case, and, in this view of the matter, there were two circumstances in the evidence of great importance: these were, the want of motive for the commission of the crime, and its being committed under circumstances which rendered detection inevitable. They could come to no other conclusion than that the prisoner had taken away the life of his wife, and that this was murder, unless he had satisfied them that he was not capable at the time of appreciating his acts (j).

not guilty on the ground of insanity; that was an issue far too vague, indefinite, and undefined. The issue was, whether or not when he did the act, he was legally responsible; in other words, whether he knew its nature, and knew that it was wrong. The distance, indeed, between the extreme points of manifest mania and perfect sense was great, but they approach by gradual

It is usual but not essential in a question of insanity to call medical witnesses or lunacy experts (k).

In R. v. Wright (l), on a trial for murder, the prisoner was acquitted, but a question was reserved as to whether the evidence of a medical man was properly admitted. He volunteered his evidence, and wished to give his opinion upon the evidence as to the state of the prisoner's mind at the time the act was done; and he was allowed so to do. The judges did not come to any formal resolution; but they all thought that in such a case a witness of medical skill might be asked, whether in his judgment such and such appearances were symptoms of insanity, and whether a long fast, followed by a draught of strong liquor, was likely to produce a paroxysm of the disorder in a person subject to it? and that by such questions the effect of his testimony might be got in an unexceptionable manner. Several of the judges doubted whether the witness could be asked on the very point which the jury were to decide; viz., whether, from the testimony given in the case, the act with which the prisoner was charged was, in his opinion, an act of insanity? In R. v. Searle (m), a case of malicious wounding, where it was proposed to call a physician who had heard the whole evidence, to give his opinion as to the insanity of the prisoner, Park, J., after referring to the preceding case, allowed the physician to be asked whether the facts and appearances proved shewed symptoms of insanity.

In R. v. Frances (n), where the defence to an indictment for murder was that the prisoner was insane at the time he committed the act, and witnesses were called to prove that insanity had existed in many members of the prisoner's family and that he had been insane for three years, a physician, who had been in court during the whole trial, was asked by the counsel for the prosecution 'whether, from all the evidence he had heard, both for the prosecution and defence, he was of opinion that the prisoner, at the time he did the act, was of unsound mind?' and the opinion of the judges in answer to the fifth question in Macnaughton's case (o) was cited in support of the question. Alderson, B., and Cresswell, J., held that the question ought not to be put. The proper mode is to ask what are the symptoms of insanity, or to take particular facts, and assuming them to be true, to ask whether they indicate insanity. To take the course suggested is really to substitute the witness for the jury, and allow him to decide upon the whole case. The jury have the facts before them, and they alone must interpret them by the general opinions of scientific men (p).

steps and slow degree. The law, however, did not say that when any degree of insanity existed, the party was not responsible, but that when he was in a state of mind to know the distinction between right and wrong, and the nature of the act he committed, he was responsible.' Bainbrigg*, 4 Cox, 454, the trial of an ejectment where the question turned on the sanity of the testator, and a physician was asked whether in his opinion, from the facts proved in evidence, the testator was sane or insane, Campbell, C.J., said the witness might give general scientific evidence on the causes and symptoms of insanity, but he must not express an opinion as to the result of the evidence he had heard with reference to the sanity or insanity of the testator; his lordship saying

Where the defence of insanity has been set up, it has been common practice to prove that other members of the prisoner's family have been afflicted with insanity; but it is a matter of fact that insanity is often hereditary in a family, and therefore that fact should be proved, in the first instance, by the testimony of medical men, and then the inquiry whether another member of the prisoner's family has been insane will be legitimate (g).

Where in support of a defence of insanity the prisoner's counsel attempted to quote from 'Cooper's Surgery' the author's opinions on the subject, in his address to the jury, on the ground that they were the sentiments of one who had studied the subject, and submitted that it was admissible in the same way as opinions of scientific men on matters appertaining to foreign law; Alderson, B., said: 'I should not allow you to read a work on foreign law. Any person who was properly conversant with it might be examined; but then he adds his own personal knowledge and experience to the information he may have obtained from books. We must have the evidence of individuals, not their written opinions. You surely cannot contend that you may give the book in evidence, and if not, what right have you to quote from it in your address, and do that indirectly which you would not be permitted to do in the ordinary course?' And on its being said that it was certainly done in Macnaughton's case, Alderson, B., added, 'And that shows still more strongly the necessity for a stringent adherence to the rules laid down for our observance. But for the non-interposition of the judge in that case, you would not probably have thought it necessary to make this struggle now' (r).

The application of the rules and principles laid down in these cases to each particular case as it may arise, will necessarily in many instances be attended with difficulty; more especially with regard to the true interpretation of the expressions, which state that the prisoner, in order to be a proper subject of exemption from punishment on the ground of insanity, should appear to have been unable 'to distinguish right from wrong,' or to discern 'that he was doing a wrong act,' or should appear to have been 'totally deprived of his understanding and memory'; as even in Hadfield's case (s) his expressions when apprehended, that 'he was tired of life,' that 'he wanted to get rid of it,' and that 'he did not intend anything against the life of the King, but knew that the attempt only would answer his purpose'; seem to shew that he must have been aware that he was doing a wrong act, though the degree of its criminality might have been but imperfectly presented to him, through the morbid delusion by which his senses and understanding were affected. But it is clear that idle and frantic humours, actions occasionally unaccountable and extraordinary, mere dejection of spirits, or even such insanity as will sustain a commission of lunacy, will not be sufficient to render a person irresponsible for a criminal act. And it seems that peremptorily that he would not allow a physician to be substituted for a jury. The verdict was for the plaintiff, which prevented this ruling from being questioned in the court above.

though if there be a total permanent want of reason, or if there be a total temporary want of it when the offence was committed, the prisoner will be entitled to an acquittal; yet, if there be a partial degree of reason, a competent use of it, sufficient to have restrained those passions which produced the crime; if there be thought and design, a faculty to distinguish the nature of actions, to discern the difference between moral good and evil; then, upon the fact of the offence proved, the judgment of the law must take place (t).

Procedure with reference to insane offenders.—At whatever stage insanity arises with reference to an alleged offence, its existence is treated as a bar to giving the verdict or judgment appropriate in the case of a prisoner of unsound mind.

It is stated by the older authorities that, if a man in his sound memory commits a capital offence, and before arraignment becomes mad, he ought not to be arraigned for it, because he is not able to plead to it with that advice and caution that he ought. And if, after he has pleaded, he becomes mad, he shall not be tried, as he cannot make his defence. If, after he is tried and found guilty, he loses his senses before judgment, judgment shall not be pronounced; and if after judgment he becomes of non-sane memory, execution shall be stayed; for, had the prisoner been of sound memory, he might have alleged something in stay of judgment or execution (u).

It is now the practice to bring up the prisoner for arraignment unless he is certified to be insane in manner provided by the Criminal Lunatics Act, 1884 (v) (47 & 48 Vict. c. 64). By that Act, s. 2, subsect. (1), 'where a prisoner is certified in manner provided in this section to be insane, a Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, by warrant (w), direct such prisoner to be removed to the asylum named in the warrant, and thereupon such prisoner shall be removed to and received in such asylum and subject to the provisions of this Act, relating to conditional discharge, or otherwise, shall be detained therein, or in any other asylum to which he may be transferred in pursuance of this Act, as a criminal lunatic (x) until he ceases to be a criminal lunatic.' The effect of removal under the certificate is to prevent the arraignment or trial of the person to whom it relates, until he is remitted to prison for trial under sect. 3 (y).

The disposal and treatment of criminal lunatics is regulated by the Criminal Lunatic Asylums Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 75), and by ss. 4–16 of the Act of 1884. The prisons appointed as asylums for criminal lunatics are Broadmoor and Parkhurst. See Stat. R. and Orders Revised (ed. 1904), tit. 'Lunatic (E).'

Peacock*, 12 Cox, 21.

This enactment was passed to deal with cases of persons obviously too mad to be arraigned (z).

By subsect. (2), 'A person shall cease to be a criminal lunatic if he is remitted to prison, or absolutely discharged in manner provided by this Act, or if any term of penal servitude or imprisonment to which he may be subject determines.'

By subsect. (3), 'where it appears to any two members of the Visiting Committee of a prison that a prisoner in such prison, not being under sentence of death, is insane, they shall call to their assistance two legally qualified medical practitioners, and such members and practitioners shall examine such prisoner and inquire as to his insanity, and after such examination and inquiry may certify in writing that he is insane.'

Subsect. (4) provides for an inquiry by the Secretary of State, where a prisoner under sentence of death appears to be insane.

By subsect. (5) in convict prisons the power of the section shall be exercised by the Directors of Convict Prisons or one of them (a).

By sect. 3, 'where it is certified by two legally qualified medical practitioners that a person being a criminal lunatic (not being a person with respect to whom a special verdict has been returned, that he was guilty of the act or omission charged against him, but was insane at the time when he committed the act or made the omission) is sane, a Secretary of State, if satisfied that it is proper so to do, may by warrant direct such person to be remitted to prison to be dealt with according to law.'

By sect. 16, "'prison" means any prison or place of confinement to which a person may be committed, whether on remand or for trial, safe custody, or punishment, or otherwise under any other than civil process, and "prisoner" means any person so committed.'

Trial.—By the Trial of Lunatics Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 38) (b), s. 2 (1), 'where in any indictment or information any act or omission is charged against any person as an offence, and it is given in evidence on the trial of such person for that offence, that he was insane so as not to be responsible according to law for his actions, at the time when the act was done or omission made, then if it appears to the jury before whom such person is tried, that he did the act or made the omission charged, but was insane as aforesaid at the time when he did or made the same, the jury shall return a special verdict to the effect that the accused was guilty of the act or omission charged against him, but was insane as aforesaid, at the time when he did the act or made the omission' (bb).

(2) 'When such special verdict is found the Court shall order the accused to be kept in custody as a criminal lunatic, in such place and in such manner as the Court shall direct till His Majesty's pleasure

s. 2 (post, p. 84), applies to all offences tried on indictment.

shall be known, and it shall be lawful for His Majesty thereupon and from time to time, to give such order for the safe custody of the said person during pleasure, in such place and in such manner as to His Majesty may seem fit' (c).

When the questions of fitness to plead and take trial have not been decided on arraignment they are dealt with by the jury with the question of criminal responsibility (d).

Under the law prior to this Act, if the jury were of opinion that the prisoner did not in fact do all the acts necessary in law that the law requires to constitute the offence charged, supposing the prisoner had been sane, they must find him not guilty generally, and the Court have no power to order his detention, although the jury should find that he was in fact insane. Where, therefore, on an indictment for treason, which stated, as an overt act, that the prisoner discharged a pistol loaded with powder and a bullet, the jury found that the prisoner was insane at the time when he discharged the pistol, but whether the pistol was loaded with ball or not there was not satisfactory evidence, the Court expressed a strong opinion that the case was not within the statute (e).

Under the Act of 1883, the jury find that the accused did the act or made the omission charged as an offence and then proceed to negative the defendant's responsibility according to law for his actions.

Where a prisoner's counsel set up the defence of insanity for him, and the prisoner objected to that defence, asserting that he was not insane, he was allowed to suggest questions to be put to the witnesses for the prosecution, to negative the supposition that he was insane; and the judge, at the request of the prisoner, allowed additional witnesses to be called on his behalf for the same purpose (f).

Indictment.—If the acts proved to have been done by the prisoner be such as would have amounted to the crime charged, if they had been done by a person of sane mind, the grand jury are bound to find a true bill (g). The acts next to be cited do not apply to the grand jury.

Arraignment.—By the Criminal Lunatics Act, 1800 (h), 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 94, s. 2, 'if any person indicted for any offence shall be insane, and shall upon arraignment be found so to be by a jury lawfully impanelled for that purpose, so that such person cannot be tried upon such indictment or if upon the trial of any person so indicted, such person shall appear to the jury charged with such indictment to be insane (i), it shall be lawful for the Court, before whom any such person shall be brought to be arraigned or tried as aforesaid, to direct such finding to be recorded, and thereupon to order such person to be kept in strict custody till His Majesty's pleasure shall be known': 'and if any person charged with any offence shall be brought before any Court to be discharged for want of prosecution, and such person shall appear to be insane, it shall be lawful for such Court to order a jury to be impanelled to try the sanity of such person; and if the jury so impanelled shall find such person to be insane, it shall be lawful for such Court to order such person to be kept in strict custody, in such place, and in such manner as to such Court shall seem fit, until His Majesty's pleasure shall be known. And in all cases of insanity so found it shall be lawful for His Majesty to give such order for the safe custody of such person so found to be insane during his pleasure, and in such manner as to His Majesty shall seem fit' (j).

The prisoner was indicted for assaulting one E. Earl, and beating her with intent to murder her. The jury found specially that he was insane at the time of committing the offence, and also at the time of the trial, and that they acquitted him on account of such insanity, and the judge ordered him to be kept in custody accordingly. The judges were unanimously of opinion that sect. 2 applied to all offences, including misdemeanors,—and that though mere insanity at the time of the offence would not have warranted an order, yet insanity found at the time of the trial did warrant it (jj).

By the Criminal Law Act, 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 2), if any person, being arraigned upon or charged with any indictment or information for treason, felony, piracy, or misdemeanor, shall stand mute of malice, or will not answer directly to the indictment or information, in every such case it shall be lawful for the Court, if it shall so think fit, to order the proper officer to enter a plea of 'not guilty' on behalf of such person; and the plea so entered 'shall have the same force and effect as if such person had actually pleaded the same.'

When a prisoner on arraignment stands mute the proper course is, To swear a jury (k) to determine—1. Whether the prisoner is mute of malice or by the visitation of God: 2. Whether he is able to plead: 3. Whether he is sane or not: on which issue the question is, whether he is of sufficient intellect to comprehend the course of the proceedings on the trial so as to be able to make a proper defence (l). In R. v. Thompson (m), where the prisoner being deaf and dumb, but able to read, the indictment was handed to him with the usual questions written upon paper, and he wrote his plea on paper. The jurors' names were then handed to him, with the question, 'whether he objected to any of them?' and he wrote for answer, 'No.' The judge's note of the evidence of each witness was handed to him, and he was asked in writing, if he had any question to put. In R. v. Whitfield (n), a case of misdemeanor, after a jury had found that the prisoner was mute by the visitation of God, but was of sound mind, his counsel was permitted to plead not guilty for him, and the trial proceeded in the usual manner, and the evidence was not interpreted to the prisoner. Where a prisoner, on being brought up to be arraigned, stands mute or it appears questionable whether he be sane or not, the proper course is to swear a jury to try the question, as it is for them and not for the Court to decide whether the prisoner stands mute of malice, or is insane (o). Where the verdict is mute of malice, a plea of not guilty is entered, and the trial proceeds (p).

Where the defendant does not stand mute, but his mental condition comes into question at the trial, the procedure is regulated by the Act of 1800, and a jury should be impanelled on arraignment to determine questions 2 or 3, supra.

If a prisoner have not at the time of the trial, from the defect of his faculties, sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the proceedings against him, the jury ought to find that he is not sane, and upon such finding he may be ordered to be kept in custody (q).

Where a prisoner, indicted for uttering seditious words, upon arraignment shewed symptoms of insanity, and an inquest was forthwith taken under the statute, it was held that the jury might form their judgment of the state of the mind of the prisoner from his demeanor while the inquest was being taken, and might thereupon find him to be insane without any evidence being given as to his present state; and that it was unnecessary to ask him whether he would cross-examine the witnesses or offer any remarks or evidence, as that would be a useless prolongation of a painful proceeding (r). So the jury may take into consideration both the conduct of the prisoner in their presence and the evidence given (s).

Where on a prisoner being arraigned, his counsel stated that he was insane, and a jury was sworn to try whether he was so or not, Williams, J., held that the counsel for the prosecution should call his witnesses to shew that the prisoner was sane and capable of pleading; as this was not so much an issue joined as a preliminary inquiry for the information of the Court (t). But in a similar case, Cresswell, J., held, notwithstanding the preceding case, that, as the presumption is that a man is sane, if the prisoner's counsel suggested that he was insane, he must give evidence of the fact (u).

It is said in the old authorities that if a person in a frenzy happens by oversight, or by means of the gaoler, to plead to his indictment, and is put upon his trial, and it appears to the Court upon his trial that he is mad, the judge in his discretion may discharge the jury of him and remit him to gaol to be tried after the recovery of his understanding, especially where any doubt appears upon the evidence touching his guilt, and this in favorem vitæ; and that if there is no colour of evidence to prove him guilty, or if there is pregnant evidence to prove his insanity at the time of the fact committed,

The prisoner being arraigned on two indictments for murder, and having with apparent intelligence pleaded to one and declined to plead to the other, the plea of not guilty was entered for him with the assent of his counsel. The case was then opened, and the first witness examined, and it was then set up by his counsel that he was insane and not in a fit state to be tried. It was held that the proper time for making that suggestion was before the prisoner pleaded, and that, had it then been made, a jury should have been impanelled to try the question whether he was sane and in a fit state to be tried; but that, as the trial had been begun, and it would be manifestly inconvenient to recommence the trial of the collateral issue, and as, moreover, it appeared that the evidence as to the prisoner's present sanity was very much mixed up with the general question of his sanity, it was open to the Court, under the Trial of Lunatics Act, 1800 (v), to take the whole of the evidence, and then leave to the jury both questions as to the prisoner's state of mind at the time of the act, and at the time of trial (w).

A person deaf and dumb from four years of age was indicted for larceny from the person, and not answering when called upon to plead, the jury found the prisoner 'mute by the visitation of God.' The Court then ordered a plea of 'not guilty' to be entered, and the trial to proceed. A relation of the person, who could in some degree communicate with the prisoner by means of signs, was sworn to interpret the nature of the proceedings and the evidence, and the Court assigned counsel to the prisoner. At the conclusion of the case, after the summing up of the presiding judge, the jury found the prisoner guilty, but in answer to a question left to them in the summing up found that the prisoner 'is not capable of understanding, and, as a fact, has not understood the nature of the proceedings.' On a case reserved, it was held, that the above finding shewed that the prisoner was at the time of the trial of non-sane mind, as he had not sufficient intellect to understand the proceedings; therefore, that it was wrong to enter a plea of not guilty, or allow the trial to proceed: and that the jury should have been discharged, and an order made to detain the prisoner under sect. 2 of the Act of 1800 (x).

Drunkenness.—Drunkenness is described by Coke and Hale as dementia affectata, or acquired madness.

Voluntary Drunkenness.—The older authorities lay it down as a general rule that voluntary drunkenness does not take away responsibility for any crime (y) and must be considered rather an aggravation than a defence (z). This rule is qualified by holding that drunkenness is not a defence to a charge of crime unless it amounts to unsoundness of mind (a), or has produced in the defendant a mental or physical condition inconsistent with the inference that acts done by him under the influence of drink were intentional, where intent or premeditation is of the essence of the crime (b). A man who, while suffering from delirium tremens, feloniously wounded another, was held to have been insane when he committed the act (c), and the same has been held in a case of temporary mental derangement caused by drink (d).

In R. v. Meakin (e), a case of maliciously stabbing, Alderson, B., said that with regard to the intention, drunkenness might perhaps be adverted to according to the nature of the instrument used (f). If a man used a stick, a jury would not infer a malicious intent so strongly against him, if drunk, when he made an intemperate use of it, as they would if he had used a different kind of weapon; but where a dangerous instrument was used, which, if used, must produce grievous bodily harm, drunkenness could have no effect on the consideration of the malicious intent of the party (g). So drunkenness is often very material where the question is as to the intent with which an act was done. On an indictment for inflicting a bodily injury dangerous to life, with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoners were both very drunk at the time, and Patteson, J., told the jury, that 'although drunkenness is no excuse for any crime whatever, yet it is often of very great importance in cases where it is a question of intention. A person may be so drunk as to be utterly unable to form any intention at all, and yet he may be guilty of very great violence' (h). So where a prisoner was indicted for shooting with intent to murder, and he was shewn to have been intoxicated shortly before he fired the shot; Coleridge, J., told the jury, that 'drunkenness is ordinarily neither a defence nor excuse for crime, and where it is available as a partial answer to a charge, it rests on the prisoner to prove it, and it is not enough that he was excited or rendered more irritable, unless the intoxication was such as to prevent his restraining himself from committing the act in question, or to take away from him the power of forming any specific intention' (i). And where, on an indictment for attempting to commit suicide, it appeared that the prisoner had thrown herself into a well, and the witness who

Grindley*, Worcester Sum. Ass. 1819, MS. Holroyd, J. In a case of murder by stabbing with a bayonet, where R. v. Grindley was relied upon, Park, J., in the presence of Littledale, J., said, 'Highly as I respect that late excellent Judge (Holroyd), I differ from him, and my brother Littledale agrees with me. He once acted upon that case, but afterwards retracted his opinion, and there is no doubt that that case is not law.' R. v. Carroll, 7 C. & P. 145. proved this, stated that at the time she did so, she was so drunk as not to know what she was about; Jervis, C.J., said, 'If the prisoner was so drunk as not to know what she was about, how can you say that she intended to destroy herself?' (j) So drunkenness may be taken into consideration in cases where what the law deems sufficient provocation has been given, because the question is, in such cases, whether the fatal act is to be attributed to the passion of anger excited by the previous provocation, and that passion is more easily excitable in a person when in a state of intoxication than when he is sober (k). Where the question is whether words have been uttered with a deliberate purpose, or are merely low and idle expressions, the drunkenness of the party uttering them is proper to be considered (l). But if there is really a previous determination to resent a slight affront in a barbarous manner, the state of drunkenness in which the prisoner was, ought not to be regarded; for it would furnish no excuse (l). So, upon an indictment for stabbing, the jury may take into their consideration, among other circumstances, the fact of the prisoner being drunk at the time, in order to determine whether he acted under a bona fide apprehension that his person or property was about to be attacked (m). So on an indictment for an assault, in considering whether the prisoner apprehended an assault upon himself, the jury may take into consideration the state of drunkenness in which he was (n). There is no reported decision in England on the question whether drunkenness can be considered as negating the animus furandi in larceny (o).

The English rule as to the effect of drunkenness on criminal responsibility seems to have been correctly laid down in a recent New Zealand case, R. v. Matheison (p). The indictment contained two counts: (1) for stealing tobacco and cigarettes in a store; (2) for breaking into the store with intent to steal. The defence raised was that the defendant was so drunk as not to be responsible. Cooper, J., charged the jury as follows: 'If a man chooses to get drunk, it is his own voluntary act. In cases, however, where intention is the main ingredient in an offence, drunkenness may under certain circumstances amount to a sufficient defence. . . .

'In the first count, alleging an actual theft, you must be satisfied that the prisoner, if he took the cigarettes, did so with a fraudulent intent; and in the second count, the intent is the sole ingredient of the alleged offence. The offence would not be complete under the second count unless the store was broken into by the prisoner with intent to commit an offence. . . .

'If that intent existed it does not matter whether the prisoner was drunk or sober, for a criminal intent may exist in the mind of an intoxicated person, and if so his drunkenness is no excuse. But if the drunkenness is such as to take away from his act all criminal intent (pp), then his act is not criminal. If the prisoner blundered into the store through a drunken mistake, and under such circumstances as to indicate inability to form any definite purpose, and especially to form the purpose of committing a larceny, then he ought to be acquitted. If, on the other hand, although under the influence of liquor, he was not so intoxicated as to be unable to form such purpose, and knew what he was about, then his partial intoxication will not excuse him' (g).

Special provision is made by the Inebriates Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 60) (r), for dealing with habitual drunkards convicted of offences committed under the influence of drink, or of which drunkenness was a contributing cause. The statute appears to proceed on the theory that drunkenness is not an excuse for crime, but if habitual a ground for special treatment with a view to seclusion and reform of the offender.

The terms of sect. 1 of the Act shew some uncertainty as to the position of drunkenness with respect to criminal liability. For the section provides for the special treatment of persons convicted on indictment of certain kinds of offences, if 'the Court is satisfied from the evidence that the offence was committed under the influence of drink, or that drunkenness was a contributory cause of the offence,' and that the offender is a habitual drunkard. According to the common law rule above stated, if the offender was drunk enough he would be acquitted, and the Act of 1898 could not be brought into operation.

Involuntary Drunkenness.—If a person, by the unskilfulness of his physician, or by the contrivance of his enemies, eat or drink such a thing as causes frenzy, this puts him in the same condition with any other frenzy, and equally excuses him (s). This rule has been extended in Ireland to cases in which such causes as long watching, want of sleep, or depravation of blood, have reduced a person to such a condition that a smaller quantity of drink would make him drunk than would produce such a state if he were in health (t).

III. Compulsion, or Subjection to the Power of Others.—General rule.—Persons are properly excused from those acts which are not done of their own free will, but in subjection to the power of others (u). Actual physical force upon the person and present fear of death may in some cases excuse a criminal act. Thus, although the fear of having houses burnt or goods spoiled is no excuse in law for joining and marching with rebels, yet an actual force upon the person and present fear of death

(g) The jury found that the prisoner had blundered into the store under a drunken mistake, and without any intention to commit an offence, but that while in the store he appropriated the cigarettes, and knew then and there that he was taking the cigarettes of another person. On this finding, a verdict of guilty of larceny was directed. Cf. R. v. Nuttall [1908], 25 T. L. R. 76, where it was said that drunkenness, while no excuse for crime, was a matter to be considered in fixing the punishment.

cited Wood-Renton on Lunacy, 913, where is also cited a suggestion made in R. v. Mountain, Leeds Assizes, April, 1888, by Pollock, B., that where insane predisposition was the proximate cause of the intoxication, the same rule as to irresponsibility would apply.

(u) 1 Hale, 43. Blackstone says (4 Com. 27), that though a legislator establish iniquity by a law, and command the subject to do an act contrary to religion and sound morality; yet obedience to such laws, while in being, is a sufficient extenuation of civil guilt before the municipal tribunal; though a different decree will be pronounced in foro conscientiae.

may form such excuse, provided they continue all the time during which the party remains with the rebels (v). The rule is sometimes stated that obedience to usurped power, which would otherwise be treason, is excused only where actual physical compulsion is used, or directly available (w). And in general the person committing a crime will not be answerable if he was not a free agent, and was subject to actual physical force at the time the act was done. Thus, if A. by force takes the arm of B., in which is a weapon, and therewith kills C., A. is guilty of murder, but B. is not : but if it is only a moral force put upon B., as by threatening him with duress or imprisonment, or even by an assault to the peril of his life, in order to compel him to kill C., it is no legal excuse (x). Where a mob forced several persons to go with them, and to take actual part in breaking threshing machines, and one of them escaped as soon as he could, he was held not to be guilty of the breaking (y). An idiot or lunatic, or a child so young as not to be punishable for his criminal act, or any innocent agent, when made use of for the purpose of committing crimes, is merely an innocent instrument of the procurer, who is answerable as a principal (z). As to persons in private relations, neither a child nor a servant is excused for the commission of any crime, by the command or coercion of the parent or master (a). Sir J. Stephen expresses the opinion that in most, if not all cases, the fact of compulsion is matter of mitigation of punishment, and not matter of defence (b).

Necessity.—Closely related to compulsion is the plea which has been described as necessity (c) or choice of evils (d), which rests not on physical compulsion, but on the force of temptation, or on disputations as to whether stress of hunger or desire to save one's own life can justify theft or homicide. In R. v. Dudley (e), two sailors were held not to be excused from liability to conviction for murder, who, being adrift in an open boat, without food, under stress of hunger killed and ate a fellow sailor.

Coverture.—With a few obvious exceptions, a woman is not deemed incapable of crime or excused from responsibility of crime by reason of her sex (f). But the relationship of husband and wife creates in favour of the wife a position of non-responsibility in certain cases of crime. A wife cannot be made criminally liable as a principal by receiving her husband when his offence is treason (g), nor as an accessory after the fact to a felony committed by her husband (h), nor is she liable, criminally, for receiving jointly with her husband a traitor or felon (i), nor for conspiracy with her husband (j); nor can she at common law be convicted of stealing her husband's goods (k). It is not clear whether these exemptions rest on the theory of identity of person created by marriage, or upon the theory that the wife's acts in receiving her husband or conspiring with him are done in obedience to his will (l), because she is in the eye of the law sub potestate viri. As regards crimes charged to have been committed by husband and wife jointly, no presumption arises in favour of the wife merely from the fact of the conjugal relation; but where certain forms of crime are committed by a wife in the presence of her husband, she is presumed to have committed them under his coercion (m). It is somewhat difficult to extract from the authorities any definite and reasoned classification of the crimes to which this presumption applies (n).

It is said that if a wife commits treason or murder (o) in company with, or by coercion of her husband (p), she is criminally responsible just as if she were a feme sole (q), and she is said by Blackstone to be responsible for 'The reason given is the heinousness of those crimes. I find no decision which warrants the position in the text, as to treason, murder or robbery. Somerville's case, 1 And. 104, which is the only case where husband and wife have been convicted of treason, only shows that a wife may be convicted of treason with her husband. There Arden and his wife were charged with procuring Somerville to destroy the Queen, and both found guilty, but as none of the evidence is stated, it may have been that the wife was the instigator, and both properly convicted. In Somerset's case, which is the only case of a wife convicted, as well as her husband, as an accessory to a murder, according to 3 Co. Inst. 50, the Earl and Countess were indicted as accessories before the fact, to the murder of Sir T. Overbury, the wife was arraigned alone first, and pleaded guilty, and being asked what she had to say why judgment of death should not be given against her, she said, "I can much aggravate, but nothing extenuate my fault." (2 St. Tr. 957.) Assuming, therefore, that the indictment was joint against both, the case only proves that the wife may properly be convicted upon her own confession, which indicates that she was the more guilty party; as it is clear she was in this case. See Hume's Hist. Eng. vol. 6, p. 68, &c. But as the Earl and Countess were separately arraigned, and on different days, and as the indictment against the Earl, as recited in his pardon (2 St. Tr. 1014), is against him alone, I infer that the Countess was indicted alone; if so, the case is merely that of a wife pleading guilty to an indictment charging her alone as accessory, and unless in such a case she either pleaded that she committed the offence in company with her husband (as it seems she may, 1 Hale, 47. Y. B. M. 37 Ed. III. Rot. 34), or such appeared to be the case upon her trial, no question as to coercion could arise. In R. v. Alison, 8 C. & P. 418, Patteson, J., mentions an old case, where a husband and wife, intending to destroy themselves, took poison together; the husband died, but the wife recovered, and was tried for the murder, and "acquitted solely on the ground that, being the wife of the deceased, she was under his control, and inasmuch as the proposal to commit suicide had been first suggested by him, it was considered that she was not a free agent;" but I know from the very learned judge himself that he guarded against subscribing to the reason given for this decision. Probably the case referred to is an anonymous one, Moore, K.B. 754, where it is said, the question was, whether it was murder in the woman, and the recorder caused the special matter to be found, but no decision is stated, nor have I been able to find the case elsewhere. Before Somerville's case, 26 Eliz., and Somerset's case [1616], I find no exception to the general rule that the coercion of the husband excuses the act of the wife. (See 27 Ass. 40, Staundf. P.C. 26, 27, 142. Poulton de Pace Regis, 130. Br. Ab. Coron. 108. Fitz. Ab. Coron. 130, 180, 199.) But after those cases I find the following exceptions in the Books:—Bac. Max. 57, except treason only. Dalton, c. 147, treason and all crimes which, like murder, are mala in se, and prohibited by the law of nature (r). But this statement is obviously too wide, as it would include larceny. C. S. and his wife were indicted for the murder of a boy, who was bound as a parish apprentice to the husband. It appeared in evidence that both prisoners had used the apprentice in a most cruel and barbarous manner, and that the wife had occasionally committed the cruelties in the absence of the husband. But the surgeon who opened the body deposed that, in his judgment, the boy died from debility and want of proper food and nourishment, and not from the wounds, &c., which he had received. Lawrence, J., directed the jury, that as the wife was the servant of the husband, it was not her duty to provide the apprentice with sufficient food and nourishment, and that she was not guilty of any breach of duty in neglecting to do so; though, if the husband had allowed her sufficient food for the apprentice, and she had wilfully withheld it from him, then she would have been guilty. But that here the fact was otherwise; and therefore, though in foro conscientie the wife was equally guilty with the husband, yet in point of law she could not be said to be guilty of not providing the apprentice with sufficient food and nourishment (s). The presumption of coercion of a wife by a husband as to crimes committed in his presence has been applied to the following felonies: Burglary (t), robbery (u), larceny and murder, citing for the latter Mar. Lect. 12 (which I conceive refers to the reading of Marrow, a Master in Chancery, in the time of Henry VII. See Willes v. Bridger, 2 B. & A. 282). 1 Hale, 45, 47, treason, murder and homicide; and p. 434, treason, murder and manslaughter. Kel. (J.), 31, an obiter dictum, murder only. Hawk. b. 1, c. 1, s. 11, treason, murder and robbery. Bl. Com. vol. i. p. 444, treason and murder; vol. iv. p. 29, treason, and mala in se, as murder and the like. Hale, therefore, alone excepts manslaughter, and Hawkins introduces robbery, without any authority for so doing; and, on the contrary, in R. v. Cruse, 8 C. & P. 545, a case is cited, where Burrough, J., held that the rule extended to robbery. It seems long to have been considered that the mere presence of the husband was a coercion (see 4 Bl. Com. 28), and it was so contended in R. v. Cruse; and Bac. Max. 56, expressly states that a wife can neither be principal nor accessory by joining with her husband in a felony, because the law intends her to have no will; and in the next page he says, "If husband and wife join in committing treason, the necessity of obedience doth not excuse the wife's offence, as it does in felony." Now if this means that it does not absolutely excuse, as he has stated in the previous page, it is warranted by Somerville's case, which shows that a wife may be guilty of treason in company with her husband, and which would be an exception to the general rule, as stated by Bacon. So also would the conviction of a wife with her husband for murder in any case be an exception to the same rule. Dalton cites the exception from Bacon without the rule, and Hale follows Dalton, and the other writers follow Hale; and it seems by no means improbable that the exceptions of treason and murder, which seem to have sprung from Somerville's and Somerset's cases, and which were probably exceptions to the rule as stated by Bacon, have been continued by writers without adverting to their origin, or observing that the presence of the husband is no longer considered an absolute excuse, but only affords a prima facie presumption that the wife acted by his coercion. See the learned argument of Mr. Carrington in R. v. Cruse, 8 C. & P. 541, 544, 552. In 1849, G. Manning and his wife were jointly convicted of murder, but the question discussed in this note was not raised, probably because upon the evidence it was plain that she was the more active party in the offence. The case as reported 2 C. & K. 887, and 1 Den. 467, does not advert to this question, but the charge of the recorder to the grand jury, 2 C. & K. 903, contains some observations upon it. See R. v. Smith, D. & B. 553 (post, p. 94), which is quite in accordance with this note. C. S. G.

receiving stolen goods (v), forgery (w), disposing of forged notes (x), wounding with intent to disfigure (y), sending threatening letters (z).

In R. v. Archer (a), on an indictment against husband and wife for jointly receiving stolen goods, it appeared that a burglary was committed by their two daughters. The mother and the daughters brought (b) two trunks, and packed them with a quantity of the stolen property. The trunks were afterwards found in London (in consequence of a statement made by the wife, who, when the house was searched had denied that any of the stolen goods were in it, and made various other false statements), and a quantity of the stolen property was found concealed in different parts of the house. On a verdict of guilty being returned against both husband and wife, it was held, that as the charge against the husband and wife was joint, and it had not been left to the jury to say whether she received the goods in the absence of the husband, the conviction of the wife could not stand, though she had been more active than her husband (c).

In R. v. McClarens (d), on an indictment against husband and wife for receiving stolen sugar it appeared that the husband received it in the first instance in the absence of his wife. Some remains of the sugar were found on searching in a sink in the kitchen, and the wife stated that she and her daughter had washed all the sugar away, and had burnt the bags in which it was contained, and that she thought it a hard case that she and her husband should be at a loss of four or five pounds. Coltman, J., told the jury that 'if the husband received the property, knowing it to be stolen, and if the wife received it from him with the like knowledge, and with the purpose of aiding and assisting him in the object which he had in view in receiving it, by turning it to pecuniary profit or in other like manner, although prima facie she might be supposed to be acting

According to some, if a wife commits larceny by the command of her husband, she is not guilty; which seems to be the law if the husband be present, but not if he be absent at the time and place of the felony committed. 1 Hale, 45. It is no ground for dismissing an indictment for burglary or larceny as to the wife that she is charged with her husband and described as his wife, for the indictment is joint or several according as the facts may appear, and on such an indictment the wife might be convicted and the husband acquitted. 1 Hale, 46.

As the wife met the prosecutor at the railway station, and induced him to go to a lonely spot where her husband wounded him (see the note to the case), it is clear she was an accessory before the fact, and responsible as such for her acts in the absence of her husband, and under the statute then in force, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, she ought to have been convicted as such accessory.' under the coercion of her husband, that was rebutted by the active part which she took in the matter with the intention above mentioned. But if the part she took was merely for the purpose of concealing her husband's guilt, and of screening him from the consequences, then she ought to be acquitted. A wife cannot be convicted of harbouring her husband, when he has committed a felony, and the mere circumstance of her attempting to conceal what may lead to his detection appears to come within the same principle.'

In R. v. Brooks (e), on an indictment against a wife for receiving stolen goods, it appeared that her husband stole the goods from a shop, and delivered them into her hands. Whether the articles were stolen at one or at several times, or delivered to the prisoner at one or at different times, did not appear. The husband absconded, his house was searched, and a box taken from the prisoner, after a struggle on her part to retain it. It contained pawn-tickets which related to the stolen goods. The prisoner pledged some of the stolen goods, and had made false statements about them. Parker, B., told the jury that, as her husband had delivered the stolen articles to the prisoner, the law presumed that she acted under his control in receiving them; but that this presumption might be rebutted: if therefore they were satisfied that at the time when the prisoner received the articles she knew that they were stolen, and in receiving them acted not by reason of any coercion of her husband, but voluntarily, and with a fraudulent intention, she might be found guilty; and on her being found guilty the questions were reserved, whether the direction was right, and whether on the evidence there was any case for the jury; and it was held that the case failed on both points; if there had been plenty of evidence there would have been no case to go to the jury; but it appeared that there was no evidence at all (f).

In R. v. Banks (g), on an indictment for larceny, it appeared that the goods were found in the house of the prisoner's husband, who was a blind man, and when they were found the prisoner said she had bought them a long time before. Erle, J., said that if the prisoner had said nothing, and the goods had simply been found in the house of the husband, there would have been no evidence to go to the jury, but as she said she bought the goods, it must be left to the jury to decide whether the goods were in the possession of the prisoner or her husband; and he told the jury that if they were of opinion that the goods were in the possession of the wife without the consent and control of her husband, they must find her guilty.

(e) Dears. 184.

(f) 'This decision was clearly right on the ground that there was no evidence whatever as to the guilty knowledge or conduct of the prisoner at the time the goods were received. Parke, B., said that, as the prisoner received the goods from her husband, "it is difficult to see how she could be guilty of this offence." With all deference it is perfectly easy to suggest cases where a wife may be convicted of receiving stolen goods from her husband. Suppose she incites him to steal a diamond necklace for her, and he does so in her absence, delivers it to her, and she wears it; or, suppose a thief brings stolen goods to a house, and the husband declines to receive them, but is induced by the wife so to do, and afterwards the husband delivers them to the wife; it cannot be doubted that in these and the like cases she may be convicted, for the plain reason that she is acting in no way under his coercion.' husband and P. for burglary and receiving. The jury found P. guilty of housebreaking, and the wife and her husband of receiving. Part of the stolen property was found in the house where the prisoner and her husband lived together, and the evidence warranted the jury in convicting the husband of receiving; but the only evidence which affected the wife was that, some time after the robbery, in the absence of her husband, she produced a quantity of the stolen property, and said it was to be destroyed, and said she had been changing some foreign money, and thought she was going to be taken up for it, and asked a young woman to come down, if she were taken, and say a foreign captain had given her part of the stolen property. It was contended that there was no evidence that she received the property either in the absence of her husband or from any other person than him; and that if there was evidence for the jury the question would be whether she received it from him, and if not, whether she received it in his absence; but Martin, B., ruled that there was evidence for the jury, and did not leave either of these questions to them. On a case reserved, it was held that the questions ought to have been left to the jury, and that it was perfectly consistent with the facts that the goods might have been received by the husband at his own house, and so have come into the possession of the wife through her husband in a manner that did not render her liable to be convicted (i).

In R. v. Matthews (j), on an indictment against husband and wife for jointly receiving stolen fowls, it appeared that the fowls were found in the husband's house, and the wife said she had bought part from people who came to the house in his absence, and that her husband bought some at S. market on Wednesday; and the husband afterwards said that he was not out of the place where he resided on the Wednesday, and had bought 'the fowls' from the person who stole them; so that the evidence shewed either a joint receiving by both or a separate receiving by each in the absence of the other, and the jury found both guilty. On a case reserved, it was held that, assuming the receiving to have been joint, the wife was entitled to be acquitted, as the offence was committed in her husband's presence; and assuming the receiving to have been separate, the offence against both was not proved as laid, and that the husband was rightly convicted, but the wife not (k).

In R. v. M'Athey (l), the jury found a wife guilty of stealing from the person, and her husband guilty of receiving the property stolen, knowing it to have been stolen, and also found that the wife acted voluntarily and without any restraint on the part of the husband, and that he received the property from his wife knowing it to have been stolen by her. It was held, on a case reserved, that the husband was rightly convicted of feloniously receiving the property from his wife.

In R. v. Dring (m), upon an indictment against husband and wife for (i) Martin, B., at the trial rightly treated the indictment as joint and several. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 14; but there was no evidence of a receipt by the wife in the absence of her husband, so as to bring the case within that clause.

(j) 1 Den. 596.

(k) 1 Den. 596. There was nothing to shew any activity on the part of the wife at the time of the receipt. See now 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 94, by which persons charged with a joint receipt of stolen property may be convicted of separate receipts.

jointly receiving stolen goods, the jury found that the wife received them without the control or knowledge of and apart from her husband, and that the husband afterwards adopted his wife's receipt; and it was held that, upon this finding, the conviction of the husband could not be supported. The word 'adopted' might mean that the husband passively consented to what his wife had done without taking any active part in the matter, and in that case he would not be guilty of receiving. Or, it might mean that he did take such active part; but this rigid construction ought not to be put upon the word 'adopted' (n). But in R. v. Woodward (o), where the thief delivered the stolen property to the prisoner's wife in his absence, and she then paid sixpence on account, but the amount to be paid was not then fixed; and afterwards the prisoner and the thief met, agreed on the price, and the prisoner paid the balance; it was held that the receipt was not complete till the price was fixed, and the money paid, and consequently that the prisoner was rightly convicted of receiving the stolen property.

Misdemeanors.—As to whether the presumption in favour of coercion when a wife commits an offence in the presence of her husband extends to misdemeanor, the authorities are not consistent. They display some confusion between two distinct questions: (1) whether husband and wife can be jointly indicted (p) for an offence, and (2) whether if the wife is indicted, whether severally or jointly, for a misdemeanor committed in her husband's presence, the presumption of coercion by him arises.

It has been held a wife may be indicted and convicted with her husband for keeping a bawdy house (q), or gaming house (r).

In R. v. Dicks (s), it appears to have been held by all the judges, upon an indictment against a married woman, for falsely swearing herself to be next of kin and procuring administration, that she was guilty of the offence, though her husband was with her when she took the oath.

In R. v. Cruse (t), a wife was convicted with her husband of assault

(n) It was doubted, whether 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 14, applied to successive receipts of the whole property stolen. See the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II. c. 3), s. 17, 'except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same.' No one ever doubted that a receipt of the whole was within this section, now embodied in s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71). Cf. R. v. Orris, 1 Cr. App. R. 199; 73 J. P. 15.

(o) L. & C. 122.

(p) In R. v. Martin, 8 A. & E. 481, husband and wife were convicted of obtaining goods by false pretences. The judgment was reversed, but not on the ground of coercion, or that the indictment was joint. There is no doubt that in all misdemeanors a wife may be jointly convicted with her husband, as she may be proved to have acted voluntarily.

(q) R. v. Williams, 10 Mod. 63. 1 Salk. 384. And see Baldwin v. Blackmore, 1 Burr. 595, 600. 'The ratio decidendi in R. v. Williams was that the wife might probably have as great, nay, a greater, share in the criminal management of the house, and that the offence was such as might generally be presumed to be managed by the intrigues of the sex. This case, and R. v. Ingram, 1 Salk. 384, were decided on motion in arrest of judgment, and the Court would presume if necessary that the wife had acted voluntarily, and the reasons given indicate that to warrant conviction the wife must have acted voluntarily and not under coercion.' C. S. G.

(r) 1 Hawk. c. 1, s. 12. R. v. Dixon, 10 Mod. 335. 1 Salk. 384 on demurrer. 'By the indictment the husband and wife et uterque eorum were charged with the offence. The Court did, it would seem, hold the indictment good because it might be proved that the wife was not under coercion.' C. S. G.

(s) [1817] 2 MS. Sum. tit. 'Of Offenders,' and MS. Bayley, J. It does not appear whether the ratio decidendi was that the presumption did not apply to false swearing or that it was rebutted by the evidence.

upon an indictment for inflicting bodily injury dangerous to life, with intent to murder (u). A case was reserved by Patteson, J., and fully argued before all the judges on two points, the second being as to the application of the presumption as to coercion (v). All the judges were of opinion that the point as to presumed coercion did not arise, as the ultimate result of the case was a conviction for misdemeanor (w). This decision can be explained on the ground that the presumption, if any, was rebutted by the active part taken by the wife in the acts on which the indictment was founded, viz., ferocious ill-treatment of her own natural child. In R. v. Price (x), on an indictment of husband and wife for a misdemeanor in uttering counterfeit coin, it was ruled that the wife was entitled to acquittal on the ground that she uttered the coin in her husband's presence. Mirehouse, Common Serjeant, after consulting Bosanquet and Coltman, JJ., said, 'the judges agree with me, and I think the reason of the thing is that the same rule which applies in cases of felony should apply also to cases of misdemeanor like the present' (y). And in R. v. Torpey (z), Russell Gurney, Recorder, after consulting Bramwell, B., appears to have ruled that the presumption applied in favour of a wife jointly indicted with her husband for the misdemeanor of an assault causing actual bodily harm.

The presumption as to coercion of wife by husband arises only when the offence in question was committed in the husband's presence (a). Where a married woman offends alone without the company or coercion of her husband she is responsible for her offence as much as if she were a feme sole (b); and if it is of such a nature that it may be committed by her alone, without the concurrence of her husband, she may be indicted for it without the husband; the husband need not be included in an indictment for any offences to which he is in no way privy. Thus a married woman may be indicted for riot (c); for being a common scold (d); for assault and battery (e); for forcible entry (f); and for keeping a bawdy house (g); and for trespass (h). And she may also be indicted for larceny of goods of which she is bailee (i), or for receiving stolen goods by her own separate act without the privy of her husband; or if he, knowing thereof, leaves the house and forsakes her company, she alone shall be guilty as accessory (j) ; and though in a serious offence, such as sending threatening letters, the husband is an agent in the transaction, yet, if he is so ignorantly by the artifice of the wife, she alone is punishable (k).

It is no excuse for the wife that she committed the offence by her husband's order and procurement, if she committed it in his absence ; at least it is not to be presumed in such case that she acted by coercion. S. Morris was tried for uttering a forged order, knowing it to be forged, and her husband for procuring her to commit the offence ; and it appeared that her husband ordered her to do it, but that she uttered the instrument in his absence. Upon a case reserved, the judges held that the presumption of coercion at the time of the uttering did not arise, as the husband was absent at that time ; and that the wife was properly convicted of the uttering, and the husband of the procuring (l). In R. v. Hughes (m), where the prisoner was indicted for forgery and uttering Bank of England notes, the principal witness stated, that, in consequence of a conversation which he had had some time before with the prisoner's husband, he went to the husband's shop ; that the husband was not present, but he bought of her three two pound notes, at one pound four shillings each ; that he paid her for the notes, and was to receive eight shillings in change ; and before he had received the change, the husband looked into the room, but did not come in or interfere with the business further than by saying, 'Get on with you.' After this the witness and the prisoner returned into the shop where the husband was ; the prisoner gave him the change, and both the prisoner and her husband cautioned him to be careful. The counsel for the prisoner objected that she acted under the coercion of her husband ; that the evidence would have been sufficient to have convicted the husband, if both the husband and wife had been upon their trial ; and that therefore the prisoner ought to be acquitted (n). But Thomson, B., said, 'I am very clear as to the law on this point. The law, out of tenderness to the wife, if a felony be committed in the presence of the husband, raises a presumption prima facie, and prima facie only, as is clearly laid down by Lord Hale, that it was done under his coercion (o) : but it is absolutely necessary that the husband should in such case be actually present, and taking a part in the transaction. Here it is entirely the act of the wife ; it is indeed in consequence of a communication previously with the husband, that the witness applies to the wife ; but she is ready to deal, and has on her person the articles which she delivers to the witness. There was a putting off before the husband came : and it was sufficient if before that time she did that which was necessary to complete the crime. The coercion must be at the time of the act done, and then the law out of tenderness refers it prima facie to the coercion of the husband. But when the crime has been completed in his absence, no subsequent act of his (although it might possibly make him an accessory to the felony of the wife) can be referred to what was done in his absence.' And it seems that the correct rule is, that if a felony be shewn to have been committed by the wife in the presence of the husband, the prima facie presumption is that it was done by his coercion; but such presumption may be rebutted by proof that the wife was the more active party, or by shewing an incapacity in the husband to coerce. Thus, if the husband were a cripple, and confined to his bed, his presence would not be sufficient to exonerate the wife (p).

Where an indictment describes a woman as the wife of a man with whom she is jointly indicted no evidence is necessary to prove that she is his wife (q).

If a man and woman are indicted together, and the woman is not described in the indictment as the wife of the man, the onus of proving that she is his wife is upon her. Thus, where T. W. and J. J. were indicted for burglary, and the woman pleaded that she was married to W., and would not plead to the name of J., the grand jury who found the bill was sent for, and in their presence, and with their consent, the Court inserted the name J. W., otherwise J., not calling her the wife of T. W., but giving her the addition of spinster, upon which she pleaded; and the Court told her that if she could prove that she was married to W. before the burglary, she should have the advantage of it: but on the trial she could not, and was found guilty, and sentenced (r). If a woman indicted as a single woman pleads to the indictment, that is prima facie evidence that she is not a feme covert, but is not conclusive (s). In such a case evidence must be given to satisfy the jury that the prisoners are in fact husband and wife (t). But cohabitation and reputation will be sufficient evidence upon such point. W. and M. A. were indicted for disposing of forged bank notes; and it appeared that they had lived and passed for man and wife for some months; upon which it was put to Gibbs, C.B., whether the woman was not entitled to an acquittal, and he thought she was; and counsel for the prosecution at once acquiesced (u). Where, upon an indictment against a woman for harbouring a murderer, knowing him to have committed the murder, it was probable that a marriage had taken place between the parties, in Ireland, at a place where the registers were very imperfectly kept, and the parties had for many years considered each other as man and wife, no evidence was offered for the prosecution, with the sanction of the Court (v).

As in

IV. Ignorance and Mistake.—Ignorance of Law.—The plea or excuse of ignorance applies only to ignorance or mistake of fact, and not to error of law. Ignorance of the law of England is not allowed to excuse any one who is of the age of discretion and compos mentis from its penalties when broken (w). On an indictment for a common nuisance by keeping a lottery, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy, on the ground that ‘perhaps he did not know that he was acting contrary to law.’ This was ruled to be a verdict for the Crown, for ‘ignorance of a statute is no excuse if the statute is violated’ (x). The rule applies to aliens as well as to citizens; and it is no defence for a foreigner charged with a crime committed in England, that he did not know he was doing wrong, the act not being an offence in his own country (y). Where, therefore, two Frenchmen were committed on a charge of murder in a duel, and alleged that they were ignorant of the law of England, and believed that acting as seconds in a fair duel was not punishable here, as it was not punishable in France, and that this was a fair duel, it was held that they were precisely in the same position as if they were native subjects of England, and the Court refused to bail them (z). And as a ship, public or private, on the high seas, is, for the purpose of jurisdiction over crimes committed therein, a part of the territory to which the ship belongs, a person on board an English ship is as much amenable to the criminal law of England as if he came voluntarily into an English county, and ignorance of the law is no more an excuse in the one case than in the other (a).

Ignorance or Mistake of Fact.—When an act is done, the law judges not only of the act but of the intent with which it was done. An act done with an unlawful and malicious intent may be criminal, although without such intent it would be innocent (b). The criminality of the intent usually depends to a great degree on the state of the knowledge or belief of the person who did the act. ‘At common law an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of facts, which, if true, would make the act for which the prisoner is indicted an innocent act, has always been held a good defence.’ . . . ‘Honest and reasonable mistake of fact stands in fact on the same footing as absence of the reasoning faculty (in infants), or perversion of that faculty as in lunacy’ (c). Thus if a man meaning to kill or disable a burglar in his own house, by mistake kills one of his every case, except bigamy and criminal conversation, living together as man and wife is sufficient evidence of a marriage, (Morris v. Miller, 1 W. Bl. 632, 4 Burr. 2057; Woodgate v. Potts, 2 C. & K. 457), there seems to have been abundant evidence in this case of a marriage between the parties; but, assuming that not to be so, it is deserving of consideration whether, if a woman received and comforted a felon, honestly believing him to be her husband, that would not entitle her to an acquittal, upon the ground that no guilty intention could exist under such circumstances, but, on the contrary, she was doing that which she honestly believed to be her duty to do. own family, he is not criminally responsible (d). And, if a woman marries again during the life of her first husband, even though he has not been absent for seven years, she is not indictable for bigamy, if in good faith, and on reasonable grounds, she believed her first husband to be dead when she contracted the second marriage (e). The rule above stated is expressed in the phrase 'actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea,' which in substance means that 'the full definition of every crime contains expressly or by implication a proposition as to a state of mind,' and, if that mental element is proved to be absent in any case, the crime so defined is not committed (f). The latest and it would seem a perfectly correct statement of the law on this subject is: 'There is a presumption that mens rea, a knowledge of the facts which render the act unlawful, is an essential ingredient in every criminal offence. That presumption is, however, liable to be displaced by the words of the statute creating the offence or the subject-matter with which it deals, and both must be considered' (g). The particular mental elements necessary to constitute particular crimes (h) will be stated in the chapters dealing with each crime. In some cases enactments by their form seem to constitute the prohibited acts into crimes even in the absence of the knowledge and intention necessary to constitute a mens rea (i). Few, if any, such enactments relate to indictable offences, and usually they prohibit certain acts in the interests of the public revenue or private property (j).

Corporations.—At common law a corporation aggregate is regarded as in the nature of things incapable of treason, felony, or misdemeanors, involving personal violence, such as riots or assaults (k), or of perjury (l), or it would seem offences for which the only penalty is imprisonment or corporal punishment (m). By the Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63, s. 2) (n), (1) 'in the construction of every enactment relating to an offence, punishable on indictment, the expression person shall, unless

VII. c. 44, s. 22, a general dealer was guilty of an offence if on making a purchase he innocently entered in his books as true, a false name and address given by the seller.

This decision has been justified as based on the scope of the Act to the purpose for which it was passed. R. v. Tolson, 23 Q.B.D. 168, Stephen, J.

a contrary intention appears, include a body corporate.' It would seem that the common law rule affords a good guide as to the intention of a statute. At common law, corporations are indictable for nuisance and breaches of public duty, whether existing by the common law or created by statute, and whether the breach of duty is by misfeasance or non-feasance. Corporations are often indicted for non-repair or illegal obstruction of highways (o), and it would seem that a corporation aggregate is indictable for defamatory libel (p).

Aliens.—There is no exception in favour of aliens (q) from liability for offences committed in England or on British ships; either on the ground of want of allegiance (r), or ignorance of the law of England (s). But neither the common law nor the statute law extends to the acts of aliens outside the King's dominions (t), or outside the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England (u), and the diplomatic representatives of foreign states and their suites are for the purposes of criminal law of England regarded as resident in the country of which they are accredited (v), and there is some doubt as to the criminal liability of an alien enemy, e.g., a prisoner of war (w).

OF CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Justification or Excuse, Common Law Rules Retained.—Code sec. 16.

Infancy.

(a) Infant Under Seven not Responsible.—Code sec. 17.

(b) Under Fourteen, Conditional Responsibility.—Code sec. 18.

(c) Under Fourteen, not Capable of Rape.—Code sec. 298.

A charge of perjury cannot be sustained against a boy under fourteen years without proof of guilty knowledge of wrong-doing. Code sec. 18 has not changed the common law, which presumed against guilty knowledge where the accused was under the age of fourteen years. R. v. Carvery, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 331.

Section 18 refers exclusively to mental capacity to judge between right and wrong. R. v. Hartlen, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 12.

No one under the age of fourteen years can commit rape. Sec. 298.

Unsoundness of Mind.

Lunatic not Responsible.—A case may be reserved at the instance of the Crown upon a question of law as to whether there was any evidence of insanity to support the jury's verdict of not guilty upon that ground. R. v. Phinney (No. 1), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 469.

Without evidence to go to the jury, the prisoner cannot be acquitted upon the plea of insanity. If there is in such a case to be any appeal after a conviction, it must be on the ground that the evidence is so overwhelming in the favour of the insanity of the prisoner that the Court will feel that there has been a miscarriage of justice. A new trial should not be granted if the evidence were such that the jury could reasonably convict or acquit. R. v. Riel (No. 2), 1 Terr. L.R. 63.

The rule laid down by the Judges in reply to a question put to them by the House of Lords, in McNaghten's Case, 4 St. Tr. (N.S.) 847, that the accused was guilty if at the time of committing a crime he knew that he was acting contrary to law, was followed and applied in R. v. Riel (No. 2), 1 Terr. L.R. 63, and leave to appeal was refused by the Privy Council, 10 A.C. 675.

The fact that the accused was so mentally defective that he was seized with an uncontrollable impulse to do the criminal act, although cognizant of its nature and quality and that the act was wrong, does not constitute a defence in law. The King v. Creighton, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 349.

Ignorance and Mistake.

Of Law.—Ignorance of law is not a good defence. Code sec. 22; R. v. Brinkley, 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 454; R. v. Mailloux, 3 Pugsley (N.B.) 493; R. v. Moodie, 20 U.C.Q.B. 399.

Of Fact.—Ignorance of fact is an excuse where mens rea is an essential ingredient of the offence charged. R. v. Sellars, 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 153.

Compulsion.—Compulsion by threats is, in certain circumstances, an excuse of certain offences. Code sec. 20.

Compulsion of a wife by her husband is not to be presumed because the offence by the wife is committed in the presence of the husband. Code sec. 21.

The former common law principle that a wife was exempt from liability in certain criminal acts upon the ground of coercion on the part of her husband, did not apply where the wife had committed the offence by her husband's order or procurement if she had committed it in his absence. R. v. Williams, 42 U.C.Q.B. 462. And a plea of compulsion was rebutted by proof that the wife was the more active party, even when the offence was committed in the presence of her husband. R. v. Williams, 42 U.C.Q.B. 462; R. v. Howard, 45 U.C.Q.B. 346; R. v. MacGregor, 26 O.R. 115.

Corporations.—A corporation is not subject to indictment on a charge of any crime, the essence of which is either personal criminal intent or such a degree of negligence as amounts to a wilful incurring of the risk causing injury to others. Consequently there is no judgment or sentence applicable to a conviction of a corporation for manslaughter. R. v. Great Western Laundry Co., 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 514.

The liability of a corporation to summary conviction was affirmed in R. v. Toronto Railway Co., 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 471, and denied in Ex parte Woodstock Elec. Lt. Co., 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 107.

Sections 247 and 252, as to want of care in the maintenance of dangerous things, do not extend the criminal responsibility of corporations beyond what it was at common law. Ibid.

Although a corporation may not be guilty of manslaughter, it may be indicted under Code sec. 222, and possibly under sec. 284, for having caused grievous bodily injury by omitting to maintain in a safe condition a bridge or structure which it was its duty to so maintain, and this notwithstanding that death ensued at once to the person sustaining the grievous bodily injury. R. v. Union Colliery Company, 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 523, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 400, 31 S.C.R. 81.

Under sec. 247 the corporation may be indicted for omitting without lawful excuse to perform the duty of avoiding danger to human life from anything in its charge or under its control. The fact that the consequence of the omission to perform such duty might have justified an indictment for manslaughter in the case of an individual is not a ground for quashing the indictment. Union Colliery Co. v. R., 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 400, 31 S.C.R. 81.

There are offences, such as assaults, which it is physically impossible for a corporation to commit, but for such offences as they can commit, whether of misfeasance or malfeasance, and for which the prescribed punishment is one they can be made to endure, they are as amenable to the criminal law as are natural persons. R. v. Central Supply Association, 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 371.

Administering the Law.—For freedom from criminal responsibility when administering the law, see Code secs. 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37 and 38.

Protection from Criminal Responsibility.—Sections 27, 28 and 29 deal only with criminal responsibility while in cases to which sec. 26 applies, the sentence or process is a justification both as to civil and criminal responsibility.

A peace officer executing a warrant of arrest which he believes to be good is exempt from criminal responsibility therefor by this section, although the warrant was bad on its face as following a conviction also bad on its face. Gaul v. Township of Ellice (1902), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 15.

A police officer is not the agent of the municipal corporation which appoints him to the position and, if he is negligent in performing his duty as a guardian of the public peace, the corporation is not responsible for such negligence in provinces where the English common law applies. McCleave v. City of Moncton, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 219.

Defective Process.—A search warrant affords absolute justification to the officer executing it if it has been issued by competent authority and is valid on its face, although the warrant may in fact be bad and although it be set aside by reason of a failure to comply with legal requirements. Sleeth v. Hurlbert (1896), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 197, 25 Can. S.C.R. 620.

A conviction for resisting a sheriff's officer will be supported notwithstanding the fact that the date of the judgment under which it was issued was erroneously stated therein, such an error being an irregularity only and amendable. R. v. Monkman, 8 Man. R. 509.

And a warrant of commitment which is valid on its face is a justification to the constable who executes it, although the imprisonment it directs is not authorized by law. R. v. King, 18 O.R. 566.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

OF PARTIES TO THE COMMISSION OF CRIME.

SECT. I.—PRELIMINARY.

WHEN two or more persons are to be brought to justice for participation in the same crime, questions arise as to the degree in which they have participated, i.e., whether they are principal offenders, accessories, or abettors, or whether their participation is innocent so that the acts done by them do not make them participes criminis. At common law the question of the exact degree of complicity was of more importance than under the statutes which now govern trial and punishment of participators in crime.

To make a man responsible for a crime, whether felony or misdemeanor, it is not essential that he should be present at the place where the crime takes effect, if he has, in fact, set in motion the agencies by which the crime is effected. Controversies in respect of venue or jurisdiction arise when the crime is initiated in one country and takes effect in another, or is initiated in one judicial district and takes effect in another(a). But in case of absence from the scene of the crime, to make a man responsible as a principal offender, he must have set in force physical agencies or have employed an innocent agent.

Innocent Agent.—If a child under years of discretion, a madman, or any other person of defective mind, is incited to commit a crime, the inciter is the principal ex necessitate, though absent when the thing was done(b). In point of law, the act of the innocent agent is as much the act of the procurer as if he were present and did the act himself(c). Where the prisoner had induced a child of the age of nine years to take money from his father's till and give it him, Wightman, J., left it to the jury to say whether the child was an innocent agent, that is, whether he knew that he was doing wrong or was acting altogether unconsciously of guilt and at the dictation of the prisoner(d).

The rule also applies in the case of libels published through the agency of the post office(e), or the transmission of poison by the hands of a person of any age, who is ignorant of its nature(f) and for the purpose for which he is to deliver it to the person intended to be killed or injured, or the uttering of a forged document through a person who does not know that it is forged(g). It is not essential that the principal should be present at the place where the crime takes effect. This is obvious in the cases of crimes such as libels and false pretences and threatening letters transmitted by post, and also applies in cases where poison is placed for another person, and is taken by him in the absence of the person who placed it (h).

A prisoner went to a die-sinker and ordered four dies of the size of a shilling to be made, stating them to be for two whist clubs. Before making them, the die-sinker communicated with the officers of the Mint, who directed him to execute the prisoner's order, which he did by making the first and third dies, and from these counterfeit shillings could be coined. It was held that the prisoner was the principal, as the die-sinker was an innocent agent (j). Where the prisoners applied to an artist to engrave a copy of the coupons of the Netherlands Bank, and the artist suspecting that there was an intention to defraud, communicated with the Dutch consul, and under his direction, employed persons to engrave the plate in pursuance of the orders given him: it was held that the artist was an innocent agent (k).

B. in London, and S. on the Continent, were engaged in planning the forgery of a plate, as appeared by letters which had passed between them. The order for the plate was given by B. to an innocent agent in England before S. came to England. On his arrival he and B. went to the manufacturer, and the plate was given to them. It was contended that B. was the principal, and that S. was only an accessory before the fact, and that it was the same as if B. had engraved the plate, and, if so, S. was only an accessory. Tindal, C.J., said: 'That reasoning would be good if the actual maker had been a guilty party, because he would stand in a different position to those who had counselled him to the commission of the crime. But it altogether fails where the immediate agent is an innocent one. Then, those who have plotted and arranged that he should do the particular act are themselves principals. Suppose the prisoners had been both abroad, and that, having planned the forgery, one of them had given the order for the plate by letter, can it be doubted that they would be indictable as principals; and can it make any difference that one of them is in this country? It seems to me, then, that the circumstance of the immediate agent in this forgery being an innocent person renders the rule of law as to principal and accessory inapplicable.' And Alderson, B., said: 'If a person does an act of this kind, with a guilty intent, he is not the agent of any one. If he does it innocently, he is the agent of some person or persons; and if two have agreed to employ him, he is the agent of both. In this case, therefore, it is a question for the jury whether the prisoners were jointly acting in procuring this plate to be made. If they were, then the engraver acts on behalf of both. It makes no difference whether they were in England or elsewhere; when they have once agreed to do the thing, the act of one is the act of all, although the rest be absent at the time' (l).

The prisoner was indicted for forging a receipt for 5*l.* in the name of W. S., who had gone to America ten years before. On receipt from the prisoner of a letter addressed to M. S., M. S. sent a letter containing a post-office order, directed to W. S. This letter was opened by B., who wrote to the prisoner and informed him of the receipt of the post-office order. The prisoner wrote a letter in reply enclosing one purporting to come from W. S., desiring B. to obtain payment of the post-office order, and saying that he was 'at liberty to sign his hand,' if necessary, to the post-office order. In consequence of this letter B. signed the name 'W. S.' to the post-office order, and received the money and transmitted the balance, after paying the expenses, 4*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, to the prisoner. B. stated that he considered the letter gave him sufficient authority to sign the name 'W. S.,' which he wrote in his ordinary hand, without imitating any person's signature. It was urged that in order to constitute forgery the writing of the name by an innocent agent must be as if it were the act of the person whose name was written. Here the signing was as an agent, and the prisoner had only been guilty of giving an authority, which he had no right to give. B. did not sign as W. S., but on the ground that he was authorised to sign W. S.'s name for him. Secondly, it was not sufficient to give an innocent agent 'liberty' or licence to do an act to make the party giving such licence a principal, for a bare permission would not make a man a principal (m). Platt, B., after consulting Pollock, C.B., 'We agree in thinking that as B. was an innocent agent, the signing the name W. S. by him is just the same as if it had been signed by the prisoner himself, and that it is therefore a forgery. We also think that the terms of the letter, which induced B. to sign, are quite immaterial, as it was in consequence of that letter that the name was written' (n).

But if a person who receives and utters a note knows that it is forged, the person who gave it will not be punishable as a principal (o); and where a person, having incited another to lay poison, is absent at the time of laying it, he is an accessory only, though he prepared the poison, if the person laying it is amenable as a principal; but is punishable as a principal if the person laying the poison is not so amenable (p).

SECT. II.—PRINCIPALS AND ACCESSORIES IN FELONY.

All persons who take any part in the commission of a felony are in construction of law felons (q): but at common law a distinction is drawn in the case of felony between—(i.) Principals in the first degree; (ii.) principals in the second degree, or accessories at the fact; (iii.) accessories before the fact; (iv.) accessories after the fact. This distinction was of importance with reference both to procedure and punishment: but much of the earlier case law on the subject has been rendered obsolete by legislation.

(i.) Principals in the First Degree.

1. Principals in the first degree are those who have committed the fact with their own hands or through an innocent agent (r), whether the fact be a complete crime or an incitement to commit crime.

(m) R. v. Maddock, 2 Russ. C. & M. p. 946 (4th ed.). 1 Russ. C. & M. 57 (4th ed.), and 1 Hale, 616, were cited.

(n) R. v. Clifford, 2 C. & K. 202.

(o) R. v. Soares, R. & R. 25.

(p) Fost. 349.

(q) Fost. 417.

(r) Vide ante, p. 104.

2. In treason and in misdemeanor all persons participating are liable as principals. (Vide post, p. 138.)

The first count of an indictment charged the prisoners with uttering a counterfeit sixpence to A., and on the same day uttering another to B.; the second count with uttering to C.; and a third count with uttering to D. The prisoners were in a town together all the day in question, and in the evening quitted a public-house together, having first changed their clothes for the purpose of disguise. Each of them uttered three bad sixpences, made in the same mould, and of the same metal, to shop-keepers living within a short space of each other, and the prisoners were found together immediately afterwards with counterfeit money on their persons, but there was no proof that they were together at either of the utterings. There were other facts to shew a community of purpose. On these facts, Erskine, J., at first called on counsel for the prosecution to elect against which of the prisoners he intended to proceed. It was then contended that if the prisoners jointly provided themselves with the coin for uttering, and shared the proceeds afterwards, they were jointly guilty of each act of uttering; that in misdemeanor there being no accessories, the acts which would make them accessories before the fact in felony made them principals on this charge, and that at all events one of them could be convicted of the two utterings on the same day, and the other of the single uttering, of which he was guilty, on one of the other counts. Erskine, J., then directed the trial to proceed, and in summing up told the jury, that if two persons, having jointly prepared counterfeit coin, planned the uttering, and went on a joint expedition, and uttered, in concert and by previous arrangement, the different pieces of coin, then the act of one would be the act of both, though they might not be proved to be actually together at each uttering. It might be different if, having possession of the counterfeit coin, they shared it between them, and each went his own way, and acted independently of the other. If they thought they were acting in concert in the utterings charged, they should convict on the whole indictment. If they thought they were uttering independently of each other, they might convict one of the two utterings on the first count, and the other on the other counts (s).

So, where, on an indictment against G. and J. for uttering counterfeit coin, it appeared that the uttering was by J. in the absence of G.; but that both were together before the uttering, under circumstances which left no doubt of their joint engagement in a common purpose of uttering base shillings and sharing in the proceeds, Talfourd, J., directed the jury that if they thought G. was engaged on the evening in question with J. in the common purpose of uttering counterfeit shillings, having one stock of such coin, for their mutual benefit; and if, in pursuance of such purpose, J. uttered the shilling, they ought to find G. guilty, subject to the question of law whether the actual presence of G., in or so near the neighbourhood as to amount to association in the very act, was necessary to support the charge. The jury found both guilty; but, in deference to the authority of R. v. Else (t) and R. v. Page (u), the question whether

(s) R. v. Hulse, 2 M. & Rob. 360.

(t) R. & R. 42.

(u) 2 Mood. 290.

G. was properly convicted was reserved for the opinion of the judges ; who were unanimously of opinion that he was rightly convicted, on the ground that, at common law, persons who in felony would have been accessories before the fact, in misdemeanor were principals, and therefore R. v. Else and R. v. Page were wrongly decided (v).

(ii.) Principals in the Second Degree.

Principals in the second degree are those who were present, aiding and abetting at the commission of a felony. They are often termed aiders and abettors, and sometimes accomplices : but the latter appellation will not serve as a term of definition, as it includes all the participes criminis, whether they are considered in strict legal propriety as principals in the first or second degree, or merely as accessories before or after the fact (w).

Presence actual or constructive.—A person may be a principal in the second degree in felony even if by reason of age or sex physically incapable of being a principal in the first degree (x). In order to render a person a principal in the second degree, he must be present aiding and abetting at the fact, or ready to afford assistance if necessary, as when one commits a murder, and another keeps watch and ward at some convenient distance (y). But a person may be present, and, if not aiding and abetting, be neither principal nor accessory : as, if A. happens to be present at a murder and takes no part in it, nor endeavours to prevent it, or to apprehend the murderer, this course of conduct will not of itself render him either principal or accessory (z).

The presence need not be a strict actual immediate presence, such a presence as would make him an eye-witness or ear-witness of what passes, but may be a constructive presence. So that if several persons set out together, or in small parties, upon one common design, felonious or unlawful in itself, and each takes the part assigned to him ; some to commit the fact, others to watch at proper distances and stations to prevent surprise, or to favour, if need be, the escape of those more immediately

(v) R. v. Greenwood, 2 Den. 453, overruling R. v. Hayes, 2 Cox, 68, and R. v. West, 2 Cox, 237. R. v. Skerritt, 2 C. & P. 427, appears also to fall with this ruling.

(w) Fost. 341. The course and order of proceeding against offenders founded upon the distinction between principals in the first degree and principals in the second degree, appears to have been unknown to the most ancient writers on our law, who considered the persons present aiding and abetting in no other light than as accessories at the fact (Fost. 347). But as such accessories they were not liable to be brought to trial till the principal offenders had been convicted or outlawed, the course of justice was frequently arrested by the death or escape of the principal, or from his remaining unknown or concealed. With a view to obviate this mischief the judges by degrees adopted a different rule : and at length it became settled law that all persons present, aiding and abetting, when a felony is committed, are principals in the second degree. Coal-heaver's case, 1 Leach, 66. And see Fost. 428, and R. v. Towle, R. & R. 314. This law was by no means settled till after the time of Edward III. ; and so late as the first of Queen Mary a chief justice of England strongly doubted of it, though indeed it had been sufficiently settled before that time.

engaged ; they are all, provided the fact be committed, in the eye of the law present at it ; for it was made a common cause with them ; each man operated in his station at one and the same instant, towards the same common end, and the part each man took tended to give countenance, encouragement and protection to the whole gang, and to insure the success of their common enterprise (a). But there must be some participation ; therefore if a special verdict against a man as a principal does not shew that he did the act, or was present when it was done, or did some act at the time in aid which shews that he was present, aiding and assisting, or that he was of the same party, in the same pursuit, and under the same expectation of mutual defence and support with those who did the fact, the prisoner cannot be convicted (b). So, if several are out for the purpose of committing a felony, and upon alarm and pursuit run different ways, and one of them maim a pursuer to avoid being taken, the others are not principals in that maiming (c). And it has been held not sufficient to make a man a principal in uttering a forged note, that he came with the utterer to the town where it was uttered, went out with him from the inn where they put up a little before he uttered it, joined him again in the street a short time after the uttering, and at a distance of 150 yards from the place of uttering, and ran away when the utterer was apprehended (d). In R. v. Brady (e), on an indictment for forging and uttering a cheque, Graham, B., is reported to have said : ‘ It has frequently been held that what would amount to a constructive presence at common law will not be sufficient upon an indictment under a statute. A case under this statute occurred before me at Derby (f). Two persons went in concert to utter a forged note ; one went into a shop to utter it, whilst the other remained at some little distance in the street ; it was objected that the latter was not liable as a principal. I saved the point ; and the judges were of opinion that the utterer only was liable ’ (g). The general rule applies to offences by statute as well as at common law, viz., that all present at the time of committing an offence are principals, although one only acts, if they are confederates, and engaged in a common design, of which the offence is part (g). And where three persons were charged with uttering a forged note, other acts done by all of them jointly, or by any of them separately, shortly before the offence, may be given in evidence to shew the confederacy and common purpose, although such acts constitute distinct felonies (h). And what was found upon each may be proved against each to make out such confederacy, although it were not found until some time after the commission of the offence (i).

trams belonging to K. on which they were carried. Whilst one load was being conveyed to the warehouse, K. said to M., 'It's all right,' and shortly afterwards M. emptied some oats out of two sacks which were on a tram close to the vessel, into a nosebag which he then placed under the tram. K., at this time, was absent with a load, but returned in a few minutes to the vessel with an empty tram, took the nosebag from under the tram, where M. had placed it, and put it on the tram, and drove off with it, M. being, at the time K. took the nosebag from under the tram, on the vessel, which lay close to the tram, and within three or four yards of K. It was submitted that K. was entitled to be acquitted, as he was not present at the time when the oats were stolen. Maule, J., said : 'I think the evidence shews that this was all one transaction, in which both concurred ; and I think both having concurred, and both being present at some parts of the transaction, both may be convicted ' (j).

Upon an indictment for larceny against H. and G., it appeared that G. was the foreman of the prosecutor, a canvas manufacturer, but had no authority to sell any yarn. On one occasion H. sent his servants to the warehouse of the prosecutor to bring away yarn, and G. delivered with the yarn an invoice made out in the name of the prosecutor. Subsequently, H. sent two of his men to the warehouse of the prosecutor, and, on arriving, they found H. and G. there. Some yarn was pointed out as the yarn which they were to take to H.'s premises : and they thereupon, in the presence of H. and G., carried away the yarn in question. When H. was charged he produced the invoice which G. gave him on the first occasion, and stated that, except on that occasion, he had had no dealings with him. It was submitted that H. was only guilty of receiving the yarn, knowing it to have been stolen, but Coltman, J., held that if H. knew that in the transaction in question G. was, in fact, committing a felony, he, as well as G., was guilty of the same felony ; and, therefore, the question for the jury was whether, at the time of the pretended sale by G., H. knew that G. was exceeding his authority and defrauding his master (k).

Going towards the place where a felony is to be committed in order to assist in carrying off the property, and assisting accordingly, will not make the party a principal if he was at such a distance, at the time of the felonious taking, as not to be able to assist in it. The prisoner and J. S. went to steal two horses ; J. S. left the prisoner half a mile from the place in which the horses were, and brought the horses to him, and both rode away with them. Upon a case reserved, the prisoner was held to be an accessory before the fact only, not a principal, because he was not present at the original taking (l). Where a servant let a person into his master's house, in order that he might steal his master's money, and he continued in the house till the robbery, but the servant left the house before the robbery was committed, it was held that the servant was an accessory before the fact (m). On an indictment for stealing in a dwelling-house, it was proved that a servant had unlocked the door of the house, in order that another person might get in and steal the property, which he did about twenty minutes after the servant had left the house. It was contended that, as it was clear that if the servant had been indicted for house-breaking and stealing he might have been convicted (n), that shewed that he was guilty of stealing the money, for that could not depend upon the form of the indictment. But it was held that the servant was only an accessory before the fact to the offence charged in the indictment (o). Where three prisoners were jointly indicted for maliciously wounding with intent to maim, &c., and one of them did not come up and take any part until the wound had been inflicted by the others, it was held that the latter only could be convicted, though the former kicked the prosecutor several times after he came up (p). So, if two prisoners go to a house, intending to commit a theft in it, and one enters first and is apprehended, and then the other enters and commits the theft, the former is only an accessory before the fact (q).

But where a man committed a larceny, in a room of a house, in which room he lodged, and threw a bundle containing the stolen property out of the window to an accomplice who was waiting to receive it, the judges came to a different conclusion. The accomplice was indicted and convicted as a receiver; and the learned judge before whom he was tried was of opinion, that as the thief stole the property in his own room, and required no assistance to commit the felony, the conviction of the accomplice as a receiver might have been supported, if the jury had found that the thief had brought the goods out of the house, and delivered them to the accomplice; but as the jury had found that the thief threw the things out of the window, and that the accomplice was in waiting to receive them, he thought the point fit for consideration. And the judges were of opinion that the accomplice in this case was a principal, and that the conviction of him as a receiver was wrong (r).

So, where on an indictment against G. for stealing, and H. for receiving pork, it appeared that the prisoners went together to the prosecutor's warehouse, and G. went into the warehouse and took the pork out of a tub, and brought it out of the warehouse and gave it to H., who had remained on the outside, and who was not in a position to see what G. did in the warehouse, but was sufficiently near to have rendered him aid in case he had been taken into custody; that is to say, the evidence was sufficient to have convicted him as a principal in the second degree; and the jury having found H. guilty, upon a case reserved upon the question whether a person who was a principal in the second degree could, under the above circumstances, be convicted as a receiver of the goods stolen, the judges were unanimously of opinion that he could not; and, therefore, the conviction of H. was wrong (s).

If a principal were to deliver the goods to another, and afterwards at a distance from the place where the felony was committed were to receive them again,

An indictment charged S. with stealing 18s. 6d., and C. with receiving the same. S. was a barman at a refreshment bar. C. went up to the bar, called for refreshments, and put down a florin. S. served C., took money from his master's till in the presence of C., and gave to C. 18s. 6d. change for the florin, which C. pocketed. There was evidence of recognition and common purpose between S. and C. S. was convicted of stealing, and C. of receiving the 18s. 6d. It was held, that upon the evidence, the jury should have been directed that they might convict C. as a principal in the second degree, and that he was not properly convicted as a receiver (t).

Common Purpose.—In order to make a person who is present when a felony is committed a principal in the second degree, there must be a community of purpose with the party actually committing the felony, at the time when the felony is committed. One count charged H. and M. with stealing from the person; another charged them with feloniously receiving the stolen property. H. was walking by the side of the prosecutrix, and M. was seen just previously following behind her. The prosecutrix felt a tug at her pocket, found her purse was gone, and, on looking round saw H. behind her, walking with M. in the opposite direction and saw her hand something to M. The jury were directed that, if they did not think, from the evidence, M. was participating in the actual theft, it was open to them on these facts to find him guilty of receiving. The jury found H. guilty of stealing and M. guilty of receiving; and it was held that the direction was right, as to make M. a principal in the second degree there must have been a community of purpose with H. in the actual stealing (u).

And if several act in concert to steal a man's goods, and he is induced by fraud to trust one of them in the presence of the others with the possession of the goods, and then another of the party entices the owner away, in order that the party who has obtained such possession may carry the goods off, all will be guilty of felony, the receipt by one, under such circumstances, being a felonious taking by all (v). So, where a prisoner asked a servant, who had no authority to sell, the price of a mare, and desired him to trot her out, and then went to two men, and having talked to them, went away, and the two men then came up and induced the servant to exchange the mare for a horse of little value, it was held that if the prisoner was in league with the two men to obtain the mare by fraud and steal her he was a principal (w).

If a murder is committed in prosecution of some unlawful purpose, even a bare trespass, all persons who went to give assistance, if need were, in carrying the unlawful purpose into execution, are guilty of murder. But this applies only where the murder is committed in prosecution of some unlawful purpose, in which the combining parties united, and for the effecting whereof they are assembled; for unless this appears, though there can be no doubt that he might be convicted as a receiver.' C. S. G.

the person giving the mortal blow may himself be guilty of felonious homicide, yet the others who came together for a different purpose will not be involved in his guilt (x). Thus, where three soldiers went together to rob an orchard : two got upon a pear-tree, and the third stood at the gate with a drawn sword in his hand ; and the owner's son coming by collared the man at the gate, and asked him what business he had there, whereupon the soldier stabbed him ; it was ruled to be murder in the man who stabbed, but that those on the tree were innocent. It was considered that they came to commit a small, inconsiderable trespass, and that the man was killed upon a sudden affray without their knowledge. But the decision would have been otherwise if they had all come thither with a general resolution against all opposers ; for then the murder would have been committed in prosecution of their original purpose (y).

Where on a trial for murder the case for the Crown was, that the prisoner and J. had followed the deceased for the purpose of robbing him, and that, in pursuance of that object, one or both of them struck the deceased on the head and killed him, and the preceding passage was cited for the prisoner : Bramwell, B., told the jury, ' The rule of law is this : if two persons are engaged in the pursuit of an unlawful object, the two having the same object in view, and, in the pursuit of that common object, one of them does an act which is the cause of death under such circumstances that it amounts to murder in him, it amounts to murder in the other also. The cases which have been referred to may be explained in this way. The object for which the parties went out was a comparatively trifling one, and it is almost impossible to suppose that if one had committed a murder whilst engaged in the pursuit of such an object, the act could have been done in furtherance of the common object they had in view, which was comparatively so unimportant. Suppose two men go out together, and one of them holds a third man for the purpose of enabling his companion to cut that man's throat, and his companion does so, no one could doubt that they were both equally guilty of murder. Therefore, if you find the common unlawful object in the two prisoners, and death ensuing from the act of J. in pursuance of that common unlawful object, under such circumstances that it was murder in him, it is your duty to find the prisoner guilty ' (z).

Where there is a general resolution against all opposers, whether such resolution appears upon evidence to have been actually and explicitly entered into by the confederates, or may be reasonably collected from some goods. The question was, whether this was felony in all ; and Holt, C.J., citing the case, says, ' That they were all engaged in an unlawful act is plain, for they could not justify breaking a man's house without making a demand first ; yet all those who were not guilty of the stealing were acquitted, notwithstanding their being engaged in one unlawful act of breaking the door ; for this reason, because they knew not of such intent, but it was a chance opportunity of stealing, whereupon some of them did lay hands.'

their number, arms, or behaviour, at or before the scene of action, and homicide is committed by any of the party, every person present in the sense of the law when the homicide is committed will be involved in the guilt of him who gave the mortal blow (a). Thus where several persons are together for the purpose of committing a breach of the peace, assaulting persons who pass, and, while acting together in that common object, a fatal blow is given, it is immaterial which struck the blow, for the blow given under such circumstances is in point of law the blow of all, and it is unnecessary to prove which struck the blow (b).

But this doctrine applies only to assemblies formed for carrying into execution some common purpose, unlawful in itself. For if the original intention was lawful, and prosecuted by lawful means, and opposition is made by others, and one of the opposing party is killed in the struggle, in that case the person actually killing may be guilty of murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances; but the persons engaged with him will not be involved in his guilt, unless they actually aided and abetted him in the fact; for they assembled for another purpose which was lawful, and consequently the guilt of the person actually killing cannot by any fiction of law be carried against them beyond their original intention (c).

It is submitted that the true rule of law is, that where several persons engage in the pursuit of a common unlawful object, and one of them does an act which the others ought to have known was not improbable to happen in the course of pursuing such common unlawful object, all are guilty.

When several are present and abet a fact, an indictment may lay it generally as done by all, or specially, as done by one and abetted by the rest (d). Or if the punishment for principals in the first and second degrees is the same, all may be indicted as principals in the first degree (e).

Homicide Cases.—If several persons are present at the death of a man, they may be guilty of different degrees of homicide, as one of murder and another of manslaughter; for if there is no malice aforethought in the party striking, but malice in an abettor, it will be murder in the latter, though only manslaughter in the former (f). Several persons conspired to kill E., and set upon him accordingly, when S., who was a servant to one of them, seeing the affray and fighting on both sides, joined with his master, but knew nothing of his master's design. A servant of E., who supported his master, was killed. The Court told the jury that malice against E. would make it murder in all those whom that malice affected, as the malice against E. would imply malice against all who opposed the design against E.: but, as to S., if he had no malice, but took part suddenly with those who had, without knowing of the design against E., it was only manslaughter in him. The jury found S. guilty of manslaughter and three others of murder, and the three were executed (g).

If the person charged as principal in murder be acquitted, a conviction of another charged in the indictment as present aiding and abetting him in the murder, is good. Holt, C.J., said: 'Though the indictment be against the prisoner for aiding, assisting, and abetting A., who was acquitted, yet the indictment and trial of this prisoner is well enough, for all are principals, and it is not material who actually did the murder' (h). And all who are present aiding and assisting are equally principals with him who gave the stroke whereof the party died, though they are called principals in the second degree (i). So that if A. is indicted for homicide, or manslaughter, and C. and D. for being present and assisting A., and A. does not appear, but C. and D. appear, they shall be arraigned; and if convicted shall receive judgment, though A. neither appears nor is outlawed (j). And if A. is indicted as having given the mortal stroke, and B. and C. as present, aiding and assisting, and upon the evidence it appears that B. gave the stroke, and A. and C. were only aiding and assisting, it maintains the indictment, and judgment may be given against them all; for it is only a circumstantial variance, and in law it is the stroke of all that were present aiding and abetting (k).

Where the first count charged D. as principal in the first degree in the murder of W. C. by shooting him with a gun, and P. as being present aiding and abetting D., and the second count charged P. as principal in the first degree, alleging that he 'afterwards' assaulted 'the said W. C.,' &c., and D. as being present aiding and abetting P.; the jury found both guilty, but added that they were not satisfied which of the prisoners fired the gun, but were satisfied that one of them fired the gun, and that the other was present aiding and abetting. It was thereupon submitted that, the prisoners being charged differently in the two counts, the jury must be instructed to find them guilty on one or the other of the counts only; but Coltman, J., thought that, as the evidence equally supported either count, it was not necessary to give any such direction, and therefore told them that if they were satisfied that one of the two fired the gun, and that the other was present aiding and abetting, they were both liable to be found guilty, and the jury returned a general verdict of guilty. Upon a case reserved, the conviction was held right, for both counts substantially related to the same person killed and to one killing (l).

Where a count charged A. with murder, and B. and C. with being present aiding and abetting in the commission of the murder, and it appeared that A. was insane at the time of committing the murder, it was held that B. and C. could not be convicted on this count (m). Where a count charged B. and C. as principals in the first degree with a murder, and it appeared that A., an insane person, collected a number of persons together, who armed themselves, having a common purpose of resisting the lawfully constituted authorities, A. having declared that he would cut down any constables who came against him, and a constable having come with his assistants, and a warrant to apprehend A., A., in the presence of B. and C., who were two of his party, shot one of the assistants ; it was held that the prisoners were guilty of murder as principals in the first degree, and that it was no ground of defence that A. and his party had no distinct or particular object in view when they assembled together and armed themselves ; because, if their object was to resist all opposers in the commission of any breach of the peace, and for that purpose the parties assembled together and armed themselves with dangerous weapons, however blank the mind of A. might be as to any ulterior purpose, and however the minds of the prisoners might be unconscious of any particular object, still, if they contemplated a resistance to the lawfully constituted authorities of the country, in case any should come against them while they were so banded together, there would be a common purpose, and they would be answerable for anything which they did in the execution of it (n).

An accessory before the fact is he who, being absent at the time of the offence committed, procures, counsels, commands, or abets another to commit a felony (o). The term accessory is in practice confined to cases of felony. It is not used with reference to high treason (p). In crimes under the degree of felony there are no accessories : but all persons concerned therein, if guilty at all, are principals (q). Those who by hire, command, counsel, or conspiracy, or by shewing an express liking, approbation, or assent to another's felonious design of committing a felony, abet and encourage him to commit it, but are so far absent when he actually commits it that he could not be encouraged by the hopes of any immediate help or assistance from them, are accessories before the fact (r). Thus, if A. bids his servant to hire some one, no matter whom, to murder B., and furnishes him with money for the purpose, and the servant procures C., a person of whom A. never saw or heard to commit the murder, A. is an accessory before the fact to the murder by C. (s).

procurement or counsel, and he in law is a procurer. In a strict sense he who caused a forgery to be done is a forger himself, and should be so charged in the indictment ; R. v. Stocker, 5 Mod. 138. The assent here mentioned must be understood of an assent to the design of forging, before the fact of the forgery committed (2 East, P.C. 973), since, according to Hale, (1 P.C. 684) an assent after the fact committed makes not the party assenting guilty or principal in forging ; but it must be a precedent or concomitant assent.

But words which amount to bare permission will not make an accessory, as if A. says he will kill J. S., and B. says, 'You may do your pleasure for me,' this will not make B. an accessory (t). And it seems to be generally agreed that he who barely conceals a felony which he knows to be intended is guilty only of misprision of felony, and shall not be adjudged an accessory (u). The same person may be a principal and an accessory in the same felony, as where A. commands B. to kill C., and afterwards actually joins with him in the fact (v).

Probably, in point of law, any degree of incitement, with the actual intent to procure the commission of the crime, is sufficient, and it is no defence to shew that the crime was not committed in consequence of the incitement, but from some other motive (see 2 Stark, Ev. 8, 2nd ed.). But there must be some degree of direct incitement. The prisoner, at the request of a pregnant woman who wished to procure abortion, obtained corrosive sublimate for her at her instigation, and influenced by a threat that she would destroy herself if she did not get it. He knew the purpose for which she wanted it, but though he gave it to her for that purpose, he was unwilling that she should use it, and did not administer it to her, nor cause her to take it. She, however, took it for the purpose assigned, and died in consequence. On a case reserved, it was held that the prisoner was not an accessory before the fact (w). The facts of the case would have been sufficient to convict the prisoner upon a charge of procuring or supplying poison, under sect. 59 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100) (x).

Where the prisoner held the stakes for a prize fight, which resulted in the death of one of the combatants, Cockburn, C.J., said: 'To support an indictment for being accessory before the fact to manslaughter, there must be an active proceeding on the part of the prisoner. He is perfectly passive here, all he does is to accept the stakes' (y).

At common law the offence of an accessory before the fact was regarded as so different from that of a principal in the second degree, that where a woman was indicted as an accessory before the fact, it was held that she could not be convicted of that charge upon evidence proving her to have been present aiding and abetting; it being clearly admitted to be necessary to charge a principal in the second degree with being present, aiding and abetting (z).

guilty as accessory, it was objected that as the jury had acquitted the principal of the burglary, the accessory must be acquitted altogether. But a great majority of the judges were of opinion that, as D. acted in order to detect the other prisoner, he was free from any felonious intent, and therefore the charge against V., as accessory, of course could not be supported (a).

If an Act of Parliament enacts that an offence shall be felony, though it says nothing of accessories before or after, yet virtually and consequently those who counsel or command the offence are accessories before the fact (b), and those who knowingly receive the offender are accessories after (c).

Statutes as to Accessories.—The Legislature, in statutes concerning accessories before the fact, has not confined itself to any certain mode of expression; but has rather chosen to make use of a variety of words all conveying the same general idea. In the Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 94) (d), which contains general provisions applicable to all felonies, whether at common law or under any statute, past or future, the words used to describe an accessory before the fact are, ‘whosoever shall counsel, procure, or command any other person to commit any felony’ (s. 2). The other Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861, and most modern Acts, use the word accessories simply, without further words descriptive of the offence (e). Some early statutes have the words abetment, procurement, helping, maintaining, and counselling (f); or aiders, abettors, procurers, and counsellors (g). One describes the offence by the words command, counsel, or hire (h); another calls the offenders procurers or accessories (i). One having made use of the words comfort, aid, abet, assist, counsel, hire, or command, immediately afterwards, in describing the same offence in another case, uses the words counsel, hire, or command only (j). One statute calls them counsellors and contrivers of felonies (k); and many others make use of the terms counsellors, aiders, and abettors, or barely aiders and abettors. Upon these different modes of expression, all plainly descriptive of the same offence, Foster, J., thinks it may be safely concluded that in the construction of statutes we are not to be governed by the bare sound, but by the true legal import of the words; and that every person who comes within the description of these statutes, various as they are in point of expression, is in the judgment of the Legislature an accessory before the fact; unless he is present at the fact, and in that case he is a principal (l).

And see Fost. 130, where, speaking of a case in 1 And. 195, in which an indictment was held to be sufficient, though the words of the statute of Ph. & M. were not pursued, the words excitavit, movit, et procuravit, being deemed tantamount to the words of the statute and descriptive of the same offence, he says that he takes that case to be good law, though he confesses it is the only precedent he has

It is an incontrovertible principle of law that he who procures the commission of a felony is a felon (m); and when he procures its commission by the intervention of a third person, who is not an innocent agent (n), he is an accessory before the fact; for there is nothing in the notion of commanding, hiring, counselling, aiding, or abetting, which may not be affected by the intervention of a third person without any direct immediate connection between the first mover and the actor. And a peer was found guilty of murder, upon evidence which shewed that he had contributed to the murder, by the intervention of his lady and of two other persons who were themselves no more than accessories, without any sort of proof that he had ever conversed with the person who was the only principal in the murder, or had corresponded with him directly by letter or message (o). For it is not necessary that there should be any direct communication between an accessory before the fact and the principal offender.

In all felonies there may be accessories before the fact except in those felonies which by judgment of law are sudden and unpremeditated.

Manslaughter.—Such are some cases of manslaughter and the like (p). But there are cases of manslaughter where there may be accessories before the fact. Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the death of the prisoner's wife was caused by swallowing sulphate of potash for the purpose of procuring abortion, she believing herself to be pregnant, although in reality she was not. The prisoner purchased the sulphate of potash, and gave it to his wife in order that she might swallow it for the above-mentioned purpose, but he was absent at the time when she swallowed it. For the prosecution, it was contended that the wife committed a felony in swallowing the sulphate of potash, and as death ensued therefrom, she also committed murder (q); that the prisoner was an accessory before the fact to this felony, and to the consequent murder, and might be tried under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1 (r), and that, although the evidence shewed his offence was murder, yet it would support an indictment for manslaughter. For the prisoner it was contended that there could not be an accessory before the fact in manslaughter; but it was held, upon the facts of this case, that the prisoner might be convicted of manslaughter (s).

Forgery.—In the older authorities it is laid down that all are principals in forgery, and that whatever would make a man accessory before the fact in felony would make him a principal in forgery (t); but this must be understood of forgery at common law, which is only a misdemeanor (u). And Bothe's case (v) decided upon 5 Eliz. c. 14, which would seem to lead to a contrary conclusion, seems from its circumstances merely an illustration of the general rule, that when a statute makes a new felony, it incidentally and necessarily draws after it all the concomitants of felony, namely, accessories before and after (w).

If several combine to forge an instrument, and each executes by himself a distinct part of the forgery, they are all principals, though they are not together when the instrument is completed. On an indictment for forgery against A., B., and C., it appeared that A. and B. bought the paper, and cut it into pieces of the proper size at their house; it was then taken to C., who struck off in blank all the printed part of the note except the date line and the number, and impressed on the paper the wavy horizontal lines. The blanks were then brought back to the house of A. and B., where the water-mark was introduced into the paper; after which A., in the presence of B., impressed the date line and number, and B. added the signature. It did not appear that C. was present at this time. The jury found that all three concurred and co-operated in the design and execution of the forgery, each taking his own part, and that A. and B. acted together in completing the notes. The judges were of opinion that, as each of the prisoners acted in completing some part of the forgery, and in pursuance of the common plan, each was a principal in the forgery; and that although C. was not present when the note was completed by the signature, he was equally guilty with the others (x).

So if several make distinct parts of a forged instrument, each is a principal, though he does not know by whom the other parts are executed, and though it is finished by one alone in the absence of the others (y). On an indictment against D., K., and S., for forging a note, and against A. and C. as accessories before the fact, it appeared that S. made the paper, K. engraved the plate, and struck off the impression; and D. in the absence of S. and K., filled up and finished the note. S., when he made the paper, did not know that K. or D. were to have anything to do with the forgery; nor did K. know, when he engraved the plate and made the impression, that D. or S. were, or were to be, concerned. A. and C. were the movers, and through them all the parties were set to work. D. was not upon his trial, and A. and C. could not properly be tried, unless S. and K. were to be deemed principals. The judges held that K. and S. were principals, that the ignorance of S. and K. of those who were to effect the other parts of the forgery was immaterial; and that it was sufficient if they knew it was to be effected by somebody (z). There was another indictment against D. and K. for forgery. K. engraved the plate, and worked off the impression from it, and D., in his absence, filled up the notes; D. was not on his trial. It was held that K. was a principal (a).

It follows, from the two last cases, that those who procure and cause an instrument to be forged, but execute no part of the forgery, and are not present when it is executed, are accessories before the fact, and not principals.

Three prisoners, S., A., and B., were charged by the indictment with feloniously uttering a forged bank note for £5 knowing it to be forged, &c., with intent to defraud the Bank of England. The indictment also contained the other usual counts, for forging, and for disposing of and putting away the note with the like intent; together with counts stating the intent to be, to defraud the person to whom it was offered in payment. The prisoner B. offered the note in question in payment for a pair of gaiters at a shop in G., and the other two prisoners, S. and A., were not with B. at the time he so offered the note, but were waiting at P. till he should return to them, it having been previously concerted between the three prisoners that B. should go over the water from P. to G., for the purpose of passing the note, and when he had passed it, should return to join the other two prisoners at P.; they all three knowing that it was a forged note, and having been concerned together in putting off another note of the same sort, and in sharing the produce among them. The counsel for the prisoners S. and A. objected, that they were not guilty of the charge made against them in this indictment, not having been present at the time the other prisoner uttered the note, nor so near as to be able to aid and assist him; and that they could be charged only as accessories before the fact. The jury found that the forged note was uttered by the prisoner B., in concert with the other two prisoners, and found them all three guilty. The prisoner B. was left for execution: but as to the other two, on a case reserved, the judges had no doubt that they were entitled to an acquittal on this indictment charging them as principals, they not being present at the time of the uttering, or so near as to be able to afford any assistance to the accomplice who actually uttered the note (b).

But where three persons were jointly indicted under 1 Will. IV. c. 66, s. 19 (rep.), for feloniously using plates containing impressions of forged foreign notes, it was held that the jury must select some one particular time after all three had become connected, and must be satisfied, in order to convict them, that at such time they were all either present together at one act of using or assisted in one such act, as by two using, and one watching at the door to prevent the others being disturbed, or the like; and that it was not sufficient to shew that the parties were general dealers in forged notes, and that at different times they had singly used the plates, and were individually in possession of forged notes taken from them (c).

And where three prisoners were indicted under the same section, for feloniously engraving a promissory note of the Emperor of Russia, and it appeared that the plates were engraved by an Englishman, who was an innocent agent, and two of the prisoners only were present at the time when the order was given for engraving the plates, but they said they were employed to get it done by a third person, and there was some evidence to connect the third prisoner with the other two in subsequent parts of the transaction; it was held, that in order to find all three guilty, the jury must be satisfied that they jointly employed the engraver, but that it was not necessary that they should all be present when the order was given, as it would be sufficient if one first communicated with the other two, and all three concurred in the employment of the engraver (d).

In R. v. Morris (e) a wife was indicted as a principal in a forgery on 49 Geo. III. c. 123, s. 13 (rep.), and her husband as an accessory before the fact at common law. The indictment charged S. M. with forging an order and certificate for receiving prize money, which had become due to one H. T., a petty officer in the naval service, with intent to defraud, &c.; and J. M., with inciting, counselling, aiding, procuring, &c., the said S. M. to commit the said felony. The second count charged S. M. with having uttered the order and the certificate by the incitement of J. M. And there were many other counts in which the offence was charged, with some variations. The prisoner, S. M., who was the wife of the other prisoner, J. M., and real or pretended daughter of H. T. (a petty officer on a King's ship), applied to a clerk in the cheque office for the payment of prize money then due to H. T.; and produced at the same time the order stated in the indictment. She went away, leaving the order with the clerk, but in about four or five days came again, when the order was given back to her with a request that she would not apply again until she was duly informed that the money had been remitted to the office. Almost immediately after this second visit, the other prisoner, J. M., wrote a letter to the Clerk of the Cheque on the subject. On December 8, notice was given to S. M. that the prize money was come in, and that she might receive the share of it to which H. T. was entitled; upon which she went to the office with the same order and certificate, which she produced; and had nearly obtained the warrant for the payment of the money, when circumstances occurred which caused suspicion, and she and her husband were shortly afterwards apprehended. H. T., whose name purported to be signed to the order, could not write, and was obliged always to make a mark whenever his signature was required; and the name of the officer, by whom the certificate purported to be subscribed, was not in his handwriting. The landlord of the house in which the prisoners lodged, stated that the prisoner, J. M., had, in two or three instances, ordered his wife, S. M., to go to Greenwich Hospital respecting about £30 of prize money due to H. T., his wife's father. He also testified that he really believed that S. M. went to receive it in obedience to her husband's orders. And it was proved that the prisoner, J. M., had signed a paper, stating that his wife had acted in this business entirely under his orders and directions. It was also proved by a witness that the prisoner, J. M., represented to him that there was about £30 prize money due to his father-in-law, H. T., and that he would be obliged to him if he would fill up the blanks in certain papers which he produced ; that the witness accordingly filled up the blanks, excepting the signatures ; and that, on observing there was a spare half-sheet to the papers he so filled up, he advised the prisoner, J. M., to send it by the post to his father-in-law ; but that he replied that his wife would get it done. This witness further stated, that he afterwards met the prisoner, J. M., who then told him that he had got the papers regularly signed by H. T. and the captain ; and that he was going to send his wife for the money. It was submitted that as S. M., in the part she took in this transaction, had clearly acted under the directions and coercion of her husband, she could not be found guilty (f) ; and that if she was innocent as a principal, the other prisoner could not be guilty as an accessory. And the jury having found both the prisoners guilty, on a case reserved, the twelve judges were unanimously of opinion that the prisoner, S. M., was guilty of uttering the forged instrument, knowing it to be forged ; and that the prisoner, J. M., was guilty of the offence of an accessory before the fact at common law.

Liability of Accessory where Principal does not follow the Preconcerted Plan.—There has been much discussion as to the liability of an accessory when the principal does not act in conformity with the plans and instructions of the accessory. If the principal totally and substantially varies from the terms of the instigation, if being solicited to commit a felony of one kind, he wilfully and knowingly commits a felony of another, he will stand single in that offence, and the person soliciting will not be involved in his guilt (g). Thus if A. commands B. to burn C.'s house, and he in so doing commits a robbery ; now A., though accessory to the burning, is not accessory to the robbery, for that is a thing of a distinct and inconsequential nature (h). And if A. counsels B. to steal goods of C. on the road, and B. breaks into C.'s house and steals them there, A. is not accessory to the breaking the house, because that is a felony of another kind (i). He is, however, accessory to the stealing (j). But if the principal complies in substance with the instigation of the accessory, varying only in circumstances of time or place, or in the manner of execution, the accessory will be involved in his guilt : as if A. commands B. to murder C. by poison, and B. does it by a sword or other weapon or by any other means, A. is accessory to this murder ; for the murder of C. was the object principally in contemplation, and that is effected (k). And if A. counsels B. to steal goods in C.'s house, but not to break into it, and B. does break into it, A. is accessory to the breaking (l). And where the principal goes beyond the terms of the solicitation, yet if, in the event, the felony committed was a probable consequence of what was ordered or advised, the person giving such orders or advice will be an accessory to that felony. Thus if A. advises B. to rob C., and in robbing him B. kills him, either upon resistance made, or to conceal the fact, or upon any other motive operating at the time of the robbery, in such a case A. is accessory to the murder as well as to the robbery (m). And if A. solicits B. to burn the house of C., and B. does it accordingly; and the flames taking hold of the house of D., that likewise is burnt: A. is accessory to B. in the burning of the houses both of C. and of D. The advice, solicitation, or orders of A. were pursued in substance; and the events, though possibly falling out beyond his original intention, were, in the ordinary course of things, the probable consequences of what B. did under the influence and at the instigation of A. (n).

Where A. counselled a pregnant woman to murder her child when it should be born, and she murdered it accordingly, A. was held to be accessory to the murder; the procurement before the birth being considered as a felony continued after the birth, and until the murder was perpetrated by reason of that procurement (o).

Commission of a Crime other than that commanded.—If A. commands B. to beat C., and B. beats him so that he dies, A. being absent, B. is guilty of murder as principal, and A. as accessory; the crime having been committed in the execution of a command which naturally tended to endanger the life of another (p). It is also said, that if one commands a man to rob another, and he kills him in the attempt but does not rob him, the person giving such command is guilty of the murder, because it was the direct and immediate effect of an act done in execution of a command to commit a felony (q).

Where an indictment charged certain persons with the murder of B. at Paris, and the prisoner as accessory before the fact, and it appeared that two grenades were first thrown and exploded, and a third about a minute afterwards, and that B. was one of the Gardes de Paris on duty at the time, and that he died of wounds caused by the explosion; Lord Campbell, C.J., told the grand jury, ‘as to the objection that the prisoner could have had no intention that those who were killed by the explosion of the grenades should be put to death, it may be observed that such a question can only arise where the principal does not act in strict conformity with the plans and instructions of the accessory. But here, if the prisoner was privy to the plot, the other persons in throwing the grenades as they did must be considered as having acted strictly in conformity with his plans and instructions, and he is answerable as accessory for the consequences. It is even laid down that where the principal goes beyond the terms of the solicitation, yet, if in the event the felony committed was a probable consequence of what was ordered or devised, the person giving such orders or advice will be an accessory to that felony. . . . The true test is, “was the event alleged to be the crime to which the accused is charged to be accessory, a probable consequence of the act he committed ? ' ' (r).

More difficult questions arise where the principal by mistake commits a different crime from that to which he was solicited by the accessory. It has been said, that if A. orders B. to kill C., and he by mistake kills D., or aiming a blow at C. misses him and kills D., A. will not be accessory to this murder, because it differs in the person (s). And in support of this position Saunders' case (t) is cited ; who, with the intention of destroying his wife, by the advice of one Archer, mixed poison in a roasted apple, and gave it her to eat ; and the wife, having eaten a small part of it, and having given the remainder to their child, Saunders (making only a faint attempt to save the child whom he loved, and would not have destroyed) stood by and saw it eat the poison, of which it soon afterwards died. And it was held, that though Saunders was clearly guilty of the murder of the child, yet Archer was not accessory to that murder. But Foster, J., thinks that this case of Saunders does not support the position (which he calls a merciful opinion) to its full extent ; and he proposes the following case as worthy of consideration : ' B. is an utter stranger to the person of C. ; A. therefore takes upon him to describe him by his stature, dress, age, complexion, &c., and acquaints B. when and where he may probably be met with. B. is punctual at the time and place ; and D., a person possibly in the opinion of B. answering the description, unhappily comes by and is murdered, upon a strong belief on the part of B. that this is the man marked out for destruction. Here is a lamentable mistake,—but who is answerable for it ? B. undoubtedly is ; the malice on his part egreditur personam. And may not the same be said on the part of A. ? The pit which he, with a murderous intention, dug for C., D. through his guilt fell into and perished. For B., not knowing the person of C., had no other guide to lead him to his prey than the description A. gave of him. B. in following this guide fell into a mistake, which it is great odds any man in his circumstances might have fallen into. I therefore, as at present advised, conceive that A. was answerable for the consequence of the flagitious orders he gave, since that consequence appears, in the ordinary course of things, to have been highly probable ' (u).

Foster, J., then proposes the following criteria, as explaining the grounds upon which the several cases falling under this head will be found to turn : ' Did the principal commit the felony he stands charged with under the influence of the flagitious advice ; and was the event, in the ordinary course of things, a probable consequence of that felony ? or did he, following the suggestions of his own wicked heart, wilfully and knowingly commit a felony of another kind, or upon a different subject ? ' (v).

Countermanding.—If A. commands B. to kill C., but before the execution thereof repents and countermands B., yet B. proceeds in the execution thereof ; A. is not accessory, for his consent continues not, and he gave timely countermand to B. But even though A. had repented, yet if B. had not been actually countermanded before the fact committed, A. would be an accessory before the fact (w).

(iv.) Accessories After the Fact.

An accessory after the fact is a person who, knowing a felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon (x), e.g., in the case of murder by assisting the murderer to conceal the death or to evade the pursuit of justice (y). Any assistance given to one known to be a felon, in order to hinder his being apprehended or tried, or suffering the punishment to which he is condemned, seems to be a sufficient receipt to make a man an accessory after the fact: as where one assists a felon with a horse to ride away, or with money or victuals to support him in his escape, or where one harbours and conceals in his house a felon under pursuit, by reason whereof the pursuers cannot find him; and much more where one harbours in his house and openly protects such a felon, by reason whereof the pursuers dare not take him (z). If A. has his goods stolen by B., and B. comes to C. and delivers him the goods to keep for him, C. knowing that they were stolen, and that B. stole them, or if C. receives the goods to facilitate the escape of B., or if C. knowingly receives them upon agreement to furnish B. with supplies out of them, and accordingly supplies him, this makes C. an accessory. But the bare receiving of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, makes not an accessory; for he may receive them to keep for the true owner, or till they are recovered or restored by law (a).

Where, after setting out the conviction of a principal for robbery of a £100 note, an indictment alleged that the prisoner did receive, harbour, maintain, relieve, aid, comfort, and assist the principal, knowing him to have committed the robbery, and it appeared that shortly after the robbery the prisoner applied to his landlady to change the note, but did not succeed, and that the principal went to a shop to purchase some articles, for the payment of which he tendered the note, and received a large part of it in change, and that during the time he was in the shop the prisoner was waiting outside; Maule, J., held that there was evidence of comforting and assisting. If a man stole a horse, and another assisted him in colouring and disguising him, so that he could not be known again, that would make him an accessory. Here the prisoner assisted the party who had stolen the note to get rid of it, and thus evade the justice of the country (b).

minutes, and both of them proceeded together that evening, by coach, to Bristol, and thence to Liverpool, where they were apprehended before they set sail for America, whither the prisoner had said they were going : it was held that this was evidence to go to the jury, upon an indictment charging the prisoner with harbouring, receiving, and maintaining the boy, although the places in the coaches were paid for by the boy (c). So a man who employs another person to harbour the principal may be convicted as an accessory after the fact, although he himself did no act of relieving or assisting the principal (d).

Whoever rescues a felon from an arrest for the felony, or voluntarily and intentionally suffers him to escape, is an accessory after the fact to the felony (e) : and it has been said, that those are in like manner guilty who oppose the apprehending of a felon (f). A man may be an accessory after the fact by receiving one who was an accessory before, as well as by receiving a principal (g). And a man may make himself an accessory after the fact to a larceny of his own goods, or to a robbery on himself, by harbouring or concealing the thief, or assisting in his escape (h).

In order to support a charge of receiving, harbouring, comforting, assisting, and maintaining a felon, there must be some act proved to have been done to assist the felon personally ; it is not enough to prove possession of various sums of money derived from the disposal of the property stolen (i).

An indictment alleged that M. sent letters demanding money with menaces, and that the prisoner did ' feloniously receive, harbour, maintain, and assist ' the said M., knowing her to have committed the said felony. The letters contained threats of exposing the immorality of the prosecutor, and one of them threatened to insert a paragraph in the ' Satirist ' ; and immediately afterwards articles reflecting on the prosecutor appeared in that paper, of which the prisoner was the proprietor, and on being cautioned as to the course he was pursuing, the prisoner said he could not stop the publication of such articles in future, and referred to M., and gave her address, and on being told that the prosecutor would submit to a little extortion rather than have his character assailed, the prisoner consented to wait a week that the prosecutor might be spoken to on the subject. Notices, however, that further articles of the same nature would be published continued to appear in the ' Satirist.' It was contended that there was no evidence to prove that the prisoner was an accessory ; it was answered that any assistance given to the principal to enable her to carry out the object with which the felony was committed was sufficient. Erle, J., said : ' I do not agree to that proposition ; the assistance must tend to prevent the principal felon from being brought to justice. The question is, did he, after the felony was complete, assist the felon to elude justice ? It is no part of this felony that

Where a statute makes an offence felony, without mentioning accessories, yet those who knowingly receive the offender are accessories after the fact (k). It has, however, been said, that if the statute creating the felony, in express terms, comprehends accessories before, but does not mention accessories after, there can be no accessories after (l). But by others it is considered to be settled law, that in all cases where a statute makes any offence treason, or felony, it involves the receiver of the offender in the same guilt with himself, in the same manner as in treason or felony at common law, unless there is an express provision to the contrary (m). Hale says that (n) 'although generally an Act of Parliament creating a felony consequentially brings accessories before and after within the same penalty, yet the special penning of the Act in such cases sometimes varies the case.' Thus, 3 Hen. VII. c. 2 (rep.), against abduction of women, made the taking away, the procuring and abetting, and also the wittingly receiving, all equally felonies.

It is necessary for a receiver to have had notice, either express or implied, of the felony having been committed, in order to make him an accessory by receiving the felon (o) ; and the felony must be complete at the time of the assistance given to make the assistant an accessory. So that if one wounds another mortally, and after the wound given, but before death ensues, a person assists or receives the delinquent ; this does not make him accessory to the homicide, for till death ensues that felony is not committed (p).

A married woman does not become an accessory after the fact to a felony committed by her husband by receiving him, nor does she become a principal in receiving her husband when his offence is treason, the law considering that she is bound to receive him and not to discover him (q). Nor is she liable, criminally, for receiving jointly with her husband any offender (r).

Prosecutions against accessories after the fact grounded on the common law are seldom instituted ; nor do they ever appear to have had any great effect (s).

SECT. III.—MISPRISION OF FELONY.

Misprision of felony closely resembles the offence of being accessory after the fact to felony. It consists in concealing or procuring the concealment of a felony known to have been committed (t), whether it be felony by the common law or by statute (u). The offence differs from the offence of the accessory in that it is not necessary to prove either privity in the commission of the principal offence, or any active assistance of the felon to escape from justice: but it is sufficient to shew mere silent observation of the commission of a felony without using any endeavour to bring the offender to justice (v), or to inform the officers of the law of the commission of the felony, or that the accused has silently observed the commission of a felony without any endeavour to apprehend the offender (w). Under sect. 8 (1) of the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), 'Every person in a county shall be ready and apparelled at the command of the Sheriff, and at the cry of the county, to arrest a felon, whether within franchise or without, and in default shall, on conviction, be liable to a fine' (x). And it is said that it is the duty of a man to discover the felony of another to a magistrate (y), and that the law does not allow private persons the right to forgo a prosecution (z). There must be mere knowledge without assent, for any assent or participation will make the man a principal or an accessory (a). Concealment of treasure trove is described as a form of misprision of felony (b). Misprision of felony is a misdemeanor at common law, punishable by imprisonment without hard labour (c). Misprision of felony is also distinct from theft-bote (cc) and from compounding a felony (d).

In 1275, the punishment of this offence in an officer was fixed by the First Statute of Westminster (3 Edw. I. c. 9), which enacted (as amended), that 'if any bailiff within a franchise, or without, for reward, or for prayer, or for fear, or for any manner of affinity, conceal, consent, or procure to conceal, the felonies done in their liberties; or otherwise will not attach nor arrest such felons there (as they may), or otherwise will not do their office, for favour borne to such misdoers, and be attainted thereof, they shall have one year's imprisonment, and after make a grievous fine at the King's pleasure, if they have wherewith; and if they have not whereof, they shall have imprisonment of three years.' This enactment has been repealed and superseded by the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), which enacts, sect. 29 (1), that 'if a person, being a he shall (without prejudice to any other punishment under the provisions of this Act) be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable, on conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, and to pay a fine, or if he has not wherewith to pay a fine, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years.' The punishment in the case of other persons is imprisonment (without hard labour) for a discretionary time, or fine, or both (e).

SECT. IV.—TRIAL AND PUNISHMENT OF ACCESSORIES TO FELONY.

The procedure for the trial and punishment of accessories now rests almost entirely on statute (f).

The Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861, which came into operation on August 6, 1861, after reciting that it is expedient to consolidate and amend the statute law of England and Ireland relating to accessories to and abettors of indictable offences. enacts as follows :—

As to Accessories Before the Fact.—Sect. 1. 'Whosoever shall become an accessory before the fact to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, may be indicted, tried, convicted, and punished in all respects as if he were a principal felon' (g).

Sect. 2. 'Whosoever shall counsel, procure, or command any other person to commit any felony (h), whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, shall be guilty of felony, and may be indicted and convicted either as an accessory before the fact to the principal felony, together with the principal felon, or after the conviction of the principal felon, or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted, or shall or shall not be amenable to

(e) The old authorities speak of fine or ransom at the King's pleasure. 4 Bl. Com. 121, where it is said, 'which pleasure of the King must be observed, once for all, not to signify any extrajudicial will of the sovereign, but such as is declared by his representatives, the judges in his courts of justice; voluntas Regis in curia, non in camera.'

(f) It is an old maxim that accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis (3 Co. Inst. 139 : 4 Bl. Com. 36), and that an accessory cannot be guilty of a higher crime than his principal.

(g) Taken from 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, upon which it was held, that it was no objection to an accessory before the fact being convicted that his principal had been acquitted. A. and B. were jointly indicted for stealing certain cotton. A. was acquitted and called as a witness against B.; and it clearly appeared that A. had stolen the cotton at the instigation of B., and in his absence. It was contended, that as A. had been acquitted, B. must be so also; for the statute had only altered the form of pleading, and not the law, as to accessories before the fact; but it was held, that the statute had made the offence of the accessory before the fact a substantive felony, and that the old law, which made the conviction of the principal a condition precedent to the conviction of the accessory, was done away by that enactment. R. v. Hughes, Bell, 242. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, was held to apply to murder (Staffordshire Summer Assizes, 1850, Williams, J., MSS. C. S. G., which has always been held a form of felony). Anon. (h) Incitement to commit an offence which is not in fact committed is not within ss. 1, 2, but is a misdemeanor only. R. v. Gregory, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 77 : 36 L. J. M. C. 60, post, p. 203.

justice, and may thereupon be punished in the same manner as any accessory before the fact to the same felony, if convicted as an accessory, may be punished' (i).

Accessories After the Fact.—Sect. 3. 'Whosoever shall become an accessory after the fact to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, may be indicted and convicted either as an accessory after the fact to the principal felony, together with the principal felon, or after the conviction of the principal felon, or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted or shall or shall not be amenable to justice, and may thereupon be punished in like manner as any accessory after the fact to the same felony, if convicted as an accessory, may be punished' (j).

Sect. 4. 'Every accessory after the fact to any felony (except where it is otherwise specially enacted) (k), whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; and it shall be lawful for the court, if it shall think fit, to require the offender to enter into his own recognisances, and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace, in addition to such punishment: provided that no person shall be imprisoned under this clause for not finding sureties for any period exceeding one year.'

As to Accessories Generally.—Sect. 5. 'If any principal offender shall be in anywise convicted of any felony, it shall be lawful to proceed against any accessory, either before or after the fact, in the same manner as if such principal felon had been attainted thereof (l), notwithstanding such principal felon shall die, or be pardoned, or otherwise delivered before attainder; and every such accessory shall upon conviction suffer the same punishment as he would have suffered if the principal had been attainted (m).

Sect. 6. 'Any number of accessories at different times to any felony, and any number of receivers at different times of property stolen at one time, may be charged with substantive felonies in the same indictment, and may be tried together, notwithstanding the principal felon shall not be included in the same indictment, or shall not be in custody or amenable to justice' (n).

Sect. 7. 'Where any felony shall have been wholly committed within England or Ireland, the offence of any person who shall be an accessory either before or after the fact to any such felony may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished by any court which shall have jurisdiction to try the principal felony, or any felonies committed in any county or place in which the act by reason whereof such person shall have become such accessory shall have been committed; and in every other case the offence of any person who shall be an accessory either before or after the fact to any felony may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished by any court which shall have jurisdiction to try the principal felony or any felonies committed in any county or place in which such person shall be apprehended or be in custody, whether the principal felony shall have been committed on the sea or on the land, or begun on the sea and completed on the land, or begun on the land and completed on the sea, and whether within His Majesty's dominions or without, or partly within His Majesty's dominions and partly without; provided that no person who shall be once duly tried either as an accessory before or after the fact, or for a substantive felony under the provisions hereinbefore contained, shall be liable to be afterwards prosecuted for the same offence' (o).

This section, like 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 9, from which it was framed, appears to extend only to accessories who at common law could be tried with or after the principal, and not to make persons triable who could not be tried at common law as accessories (p).

By the earlier part of sect. 7, where the principal felony is wholly committed in England or Ireland, the accessory may be tried either in the county where the principal felony may be tried, or in the county where the act by which he became an accessory was done. But where the principal felony is not committed wholly in England or Ireland, the accessory may be tried by any court which has jurisdiction to try the principal, or in any county in which the accessory may be apprehended or be in custody. The object of this latter provision is to meet cases

(n) Framed from 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 15, with the addition of the words in italics. 'The Committee of the Commons who sat on 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, struck out those words, not perceiving that they were the only important words in the clause: for there never was any doubt that separate accessories and receivers might be included in the same indictment under the circumstances referred to in s. 15; the doubt was, whether they could be compelled to be tried together in the absence of the principal, where they separately became accessories, or separately received.

'The marginal note to the section "several accessories, &c.," was erroneously altered after the Bill went to the House of Lords. It began "separate accessories," because the clause applies only to accessories at different times. "Several" persons may become accessories at one and the same time and place.' C. S. G.

(o) Taken from 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, ss. 9, 10 (E); 9 Geo. IV. c. 54, ss. 23, 24 (I); and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 2. Under those enactments accessories might be tried by any Court which had jurisdiction to try the principal, whether the principal felony had been committed on the sea or on land, and whether within the Queen's dominions or without, and where the principal felony was committed in one county, and the act by which the person became an accessory was done in another county, the accessory might be tried in either.

(p) R. v. Russell, 1 Mood. 356, where it was held that R. could not be tried under 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 9, as accessory before the fact to felo de se. Cf. R. v. Ledington, 9 C. & P. 79, Alderson, B.

where the principal felony may have been committed, either on land or sea, out of England and Ireland. In such cases no court had jurisdiction to try the principal until he was apprehended in England or Ireland, and consequently where the principal in such cases had not been apprehended, the accessory would not have been triable at all under the former enactments. The words in italics cure this defect of the law.

As to Other Matters.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 9. ‘Where any person shall, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England or Ireland, become an accessory to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, and whether such felony shall be committed within that jurisdiction or elsewhere, or shall be begun within that jurisdiction and completed elsewhere, or shall be begun elsewhere and completed within that jurisdiction, the offence of such person shall be a felony; and in any indictment for any such offence the venue in the margin shall be the same as if the offence had been committed in the county or place in which such person shall be indicted, and his offence shall be averred to have been committed “on the high seas”; provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect any of the laws relating to the government of His Majesty’s land or naval forces’ (q).

Each of the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861 contains a section in substantially identical terms providing that ‘in the case of every felony punishable under this Act, every principal in the second degree, and every accessory before the fact, shall be punishable in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this Act punishable; and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this Act [except murder] (r) shall be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour; and every accessory after the fact to murder shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour . . .’ (s). These enactments were passed, and came into effect on the same day as the Accessories, &c., Act, 1861 (supra).

Similar provisions are made by the Piracy Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 88), s. 4 and the Explosive Substances Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 3), s. 7.

Whenever it is doubtful whether a person is a principal or an accessory before the fact, an indictment under sect. 1 (ante, p. 130), will be sufficient, whether it turns out on the evidence that such person was a principal or accessory before the fact, as well as where it is clear that he was either the one or the other, but it is uncertain which he was. But cases of accessories after the fact must be indicted as such, and not as principals.

(q) The object of the earlier part of this section is to remove a doubt, perhaps unfounded, whether a person who became an accessory on the sea in the cases mentioned in it, was a felon. 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 9, contained a similar enactment. The latter part of the section is framed from 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2. By sect. 10, ‘nothing in this Act contained shall extend to Scotland, except as hereinbefore otherwise expressly provided.’

(r) These words are only in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 67. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 98, excepts receivers of stolen property.

(s) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 98 (larceny); c. 97, s. 56 (malicious damage); c. 98, s. 49 (forgery); c. 99, s. 35 (coinage offences); c. 100, s. 67 (offences against the person). For the rest of the sections, which deal with misdemeanors, see post, p. 139.

Where the offence of the principal is local, e.g., a burglary committed in county A., if it is proposed to try the accessory in county B., it will be prudent to include a count under sect. 2 (ante, p. 130), since sect. 1 only allows the accessory to be tried under it as a principal felon, i.e., in county A. (t): although sect. 7 may be read as authorising indictment and trial in county B., where the evidence shews that the accused became accessory before the fact in that county.

Where an indictment stated that L. cast away a vessel, and that the prisoner incited him to commit the said felony, it was objected that the indictment was not properly framed as for a substantive offence, under 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 9 (rep.), but was in the form of an indictment at common law against principal and accessory, and as the principal had not been convicted, and was not on his trial, the accessory could not be tried. But it was held that the description of the offence was not altered by the statute. It might have been put in a different shape, but every allegation in this indictment would have been included in any other (u). So where M. was indicted for sending letters demanding money with menaces, and H. with receiving, harbouring, &c., M., knowing her to have committed the said felony, Erle, J., held that H. might be tried before M. on this indictment under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 2 (v), as that clause was only intended to alter the course of trial, and not the mode of describing the offence (w). In one case an indictment alleging that a certain evil-disposed person feloniously stole, and that before the said felony was done the prisoner did feloniously incite the said evil-disposed person to commit the said felony, was held bad as being too uncertain (x).

Where the proceedings are against the accessory alone for receiving stolen goods, the name of the principal need not be stated (y). Where the proceedings are against both principal and accessory, the indictment may contain counts for a substantive felony, e.g., receiving stolen goods, without naming the principal, and upon such an indictment the receiver may be convicted, although the person indicted as principal is acquitted (z).

A man cannot be convicted as accessory after the fact to murder on an indictment for the principal offence (a). But a count charging a person with being accessory before the fact may be joined with a count charging the same person with being accessory after the fact to the same felony, and the prosecutor cannot be compelled to elect upon which he will proceed, and the party may be found guilty upon both (b). In one case (t) It might, however, be held that s. 1 in effect makes every indictment charging a person as principal in felony, charge him also as accessory before the fact. In the 6th edition of this work there is a discussion as to challenging the indictment by writ of error (now abolished) or motion in arrest of judgment. It would seem that technical objections of this kind would be disregarded under the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, post, Bk. xii. c. 4.

a party was indicted and tried both for receiving stolen goods, and for receiving, harbouring and comforting, the felon, and was convicted (c).

A count charged a prisoner with stealing certain cotton, and another count charged him with receiving the property aforesaid, and it was proved that the prisoner had solicited a servant to rob his master; which he did, and took the cotton to the prisoner, in whose possession it was afterwards found, and he stated that he had got it from the servant, and the jury found a general verdict of guilty; on a case reserved, it was held, that the jury might upon this evidence reasonably convict the prisoner as an accessory before the fact upon the count for stealing, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 1 (d), and that there was no inconsistency in finding that he was guilty of being an accessory before the fact, and that he received the goods knowing them to have been stolen (e). But where one count charged the prisoner with stealing sheep, and another with receiving the said sheep knowing them to have been stolen, and the jury found a verdict of guilty on both counts, the verdict and judgment was set aside on the ground that this was an inconsistent verdict. The Court assumed that the counts were inserted under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 3, and held that that statute only authorised the jury to convict either of stealing or receiving, and not of both (f).

An indictment against an accessory should state that the principal committed the offence; and it is not sufficient merely to state, that he was indicted for it (g).

Even at common law a man indicted as accessory to two or more persons might be convicted as accessory to one (h).

(f) R. v. Evans, 7 Cox, 151 (Ir.). The Court said that, 'it might be possible that a man may have stolen goods, and, after disposing of them, may afterwards get them into his hands knowing them to be stolen, and be thus guilty of stealing and receiving the same goods.' Now, suppose, on the trial of this indictment, the facts had been as thus stated, it seems plain that the jury ought to have found the verdict they did, and upon the finding as it stood the Court were bound to presume that the evidence proved both counts. But the Court add, 'The statements in this record negative such a state of facts;' and 'the unity of the offence in the ordinary language is put beyond doubt, the stealing and receiving are of the same chattel, laid as the property of the same person, on the same day.' This is a plain error; the property must be the same, and the time laid is perfectly immaterial; but even if it were material, a man may on the same day steal goods at one place, part with them, and receive them again at another place. Again, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 3, only said, 'it shall be lawful' for the jury to convict either of stealing or receiving; but it does not forbid them to convict of both. Suppose a written confession of the prisoner proved both offences, how can a jury on their oaths acquit of either? In point of law there never was any objection to the insertion of several distinct felonies in one indictment; it was no ground of demurrer, arrest of judgment or error (1 Chit. Cr. L. 253), but it was mere matter for the discretion of the judge to put the prosecutor to elect on which charge he would proceed. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 3, had taken away that discretion in this case, and made a prisoner triable at the same time for stealing and receiving, and as the Act contains no prohibitory words, the necessary consequence follows that the jury may convict of both if the evidence prove both offences. If it were otherwise, they must find a false verdict either on the one or other count, and thereby save the prisoner from the punishment of one of the two offences he had committed. C. S. G.

Formerly if A. were indicted as principal and acquitted, he might have been afterwards indicted as accessory before the fact (i), and if he were indicted and acquitted as accessory he might be indicted again as principal (j). But now an acquittal as principal is a bar to an indictment for being accessory before the fact; for on an indictment as principal an accessory before the fact may be convicted under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1 (ante, p. 130). If a man is indicted as principal and acquitted, he may be indicted as accessory 'after the fact'; and if indicted as accessory before the fact and acquitted, he may be indicted as accessory after the fact (k). The Act of 1861 enacts, that no person who shall be once duly tried for any offence of being an accessory shall be liable to be again indicted or tried for the same offence (l).

An indictment charged four prisoners with feloniously inciting a certain evil-disposed person unknown to forge a will; another count charged two of them with uttering the will, and three of them as accessories before the fact to the uttering. The evidence did not shew any joint act done by the prisoners, but only separate and independent acts at separate and distinct times and places. After all the evidence on the part of the prosecution had been given, one of the prisoners pleaded guilty, and it was argued that all the other prisoners were entitled to an acquittal; that the indictment charged a joint inciting, and there being no evidence of any joint acting, and one prisoner being convicted the others could not be convicted jointly with her; but Williams, J., overruled the objection (m).

Where the principal and accessory are tried together upon the same indictment, the accessory may enter into the full defence of the principal, and avail himself of every matter of fact and every point of law tending to his acquittal; for the accessory is in this case to be considered as particeps in lite; and this sort of defence necessarily and directly tends to his own acquittal. Where the accessory is brought to trial after the conviction of the principal, and it comes out in evidence upon the trial of the accessory that the offence of which the principal was convicted did not amount to felony in him, or not to that species of felony with which he was charged, the accessory may avail himself of this, and ought to be acquitted (n). For though it is not necessary upon such trial for the prosecution to enter into details of the evidence on which the conviction of the principal was founded, and the record of the conviction is sufficient evidence against the accessory to put him upon his defence (o); yet the presumption raised by the record that everything in the former decision was wrong. Suppose the incittings had each been in a different county, it is quite clear that at common law (if triable at all) each could only have been tried in the county where it took place, and this proves that they are separate and distinct felonies. And no rule is more clearly settled than that on a joint charge you must prove a joint offence.' C. S. G. See ante, p. 131, as to including several accessories in the same indictment.

proceeding was rightly and properly transacted must, it is conceived, give way to facts manifestly and clearly proved; and as against the accessory the conviction of the principal will not be conclusive, being as to him res inter alios acta (p). This was the opinion of Foster, J., upon it, counsel for an accessory was allowed to controvert the propriety of the conviction of the principal by viva voce testimony, and to shew that the act done by the principal did not amount to a felony, and was only a breach of trust (q). And in a later case, it was also admitted that the record of the conviction of the principal was not conclusive evidence of the felony against the accessory, and that he has a right to controvert the propriety of such conviction (r).

It seems that the accessory may insist upon the innocence of the principal. Foster, J., says, 'If it shall manifestly appear, in the course of the accessory's trial, that in point of fact the principal was innocent, common justice seems to require that the accessory should be acquitted. A. is convicted upon circumstantial evidence, strong as that sort of evidence can be, of the murder of B.; C. is afterwards indicted as accessory to this murder; and it comes out upon the trial, by incontestable evidence, that B. is still living (Lord Hale somewhere mentions a case of this kind). Is C. to be convicted or acquitted? The case is too plain to admit of a doubt. Or, suppose B. to have been in fact murdered, and that it should come out in evidence, to the satisfaction of the Court and jury, that the witnesses against A. were mistaken in his person (a case of this kind I have known), and that A. was not, nor could possibly have been, present at the murder' (s).

Upon an indictment against an accessory, the guilt of the principal cannot be proved by his confession, but must be proved aliunde, especially if the principal be alive, and could be called as a witness; and it seems that even the conviction of the principal would not be admissible to prove the guilt of the principal. The prisoner was indicted for receiving sixty sovereigns, which had been stolen by R. A confession by R., made before a magistrate in the presence of the prisoner, in which she stated various facts implicating the prisoner, was tendered in evidence. Patteson, J., refused to receive anything said by R., respecting the prisoner, but admitted what she said respecting herself only. R. had been found guilty on another indictment, but had not been sentenced, and might have been called as a witness. The judges (t) were of opinion that R.'s confession was no evidence against the prisoner; and many of them appeared to think that had R. been convicted, and the indictment against the prisoner stated not her conviction, but her guilt, the conviction would not have been any evidence of her guilt, which must have been proved by other means (u). Upon the authority of this case, where an accessory before the fact to a murder was tried after the principal had been convicted and executed, Parke, B., ordered the proceedings to be conducted in the same manner as if the principal was then on his trial (v). And where two persons were indicted together, one for stealing and the other for receiving, and the principal pleaded guilty, Wood, B., refused to allow the plea of guilty to establish the fact of the stealing by the principal as against the receiver (w).

The prisoner was indicted as an accessory after the fact to M., who was charged with sending letters demanding money with menaces, and Erle, J., held these letters admissible against the accessory as evidence of acts done, for it was necessary to prove a demand of the money, and these letters constituted the demand (x). But where R. was indicted as accessory before the fact to felony by S., Maule, J., refused to admit in evidence conversations with S. held in the absence of R. (y). Where, on an indictment against H. and P. for murder, P. was tried first, and H. was alleged to have fired the fatal shot in a duel, it was held that it might be proved that H. on the morning before the duel had said, 'I will shoot him as I would a partridge.' Erle, J., saying, 'This statement is an act indicating malice aforethought in H., and that is a fact which the jury have to ascertain. The intentions of a person can only be inferred from external manifestations, and words are some of the most usual and best evidence of intention. It is not a declaration after the act done narrating the past, but it shows the mind of the party' (z). In the same case, Erle, J., held that what H. said after the duel relating to what passed at the spot where the duel took place was not admissible.

As to harbouring thieves, &c., in public-houses and brothels, see the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, ss. 10, 11), as amended by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 20, s. 5 (S. L. R.). These offences are punishable on summary conviction.

SECT. V.—ABETTERS IN MISDEMEANOR.

In the case of misdemeanor, no distinction in respect of procedure or punishment has ever been made between parties or privies to the offence who could, in the case of felony, be principals in the first or second degree, or accessories before the fact. Indeed, there is no such person as accessory in point of law to a misdemeanor (a).

The Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861, enacts as follows:—

Sect. 8. 'Whosoever shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any misdemeanor (b), whether the same be a misdemeanor at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, shall be liable to be tried, indicted, and punished as a principal offender' (c).

and abettor as a principal in the second degree.

(b) This is not limited to indictable misdemeanors. Du Cros v. Lambourne, ubi supra.

(c) Framed from 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 30, s. 26; 9 Geo. IV. c. 56, s. 33 (1), &c., and really only a declaration of the common law on the subject (R. v. Greenwood, 2 Den. 453. Du Cros v. Lambourne, ubi supra).

Each of the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861, except the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, contains as to the misdemeanors punishable under such Act a clause in the terms of this section. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 98; c. 97, s. 56; c. 98, s. 49; c. 100, s. 67. And there is a similar provision in sect. 12 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90). Like provisions are made as to misdemeanors punishable on summary conviction by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), which enacts (s. 5), that 'every person who shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any offence which is or hereafter shall be punishable on summary conviction, shall be liable to be proceeded against and convicted for the same, either together with the principal offender, or before or after his conviction, and shall be liable, on conviction, to the same forfeiture and punishment as such principal offender is or shall be liable(d).

In R. v. Bubb(e), on an indictment of T. and B. as principals in misdemeanor, the jury returned a verdict against T. as a principal, and against B. as accessory after the fact. A judgment of guilty, entered on the latter verdict, was quashed by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. The Court declined to construe the verdict as meaning that B. was a principal in the second degree, or an accessory at the time when the misdemeanor was committed, and held that she was not indictable under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 8(f). Aiders and abettors in misdemeanors may be charged either separately or as principals(g).

In R. v. de Marney(h), it was held that a man could lawfully be convicted of aiding and abetting the publication in England of obscene literature by sending it through the post, contrary to sect. 4 of the Post Office Protection Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 76)(i), on evidence that by inserting advertisements, which he knew to relate to such literature, in a paper published in England, he had facilitated, or, as the judges held, procured and caused the sending of such literature from abroad into England through the post.

R. v. de Marney [1907], 1 K.B. 388; by which all persons, who would be accessories in felony, are principals in misdemeanor, hence it follows that a person indicted for committing a misdemeanor may be convicted, if it appear that he caused it to be committed, although he is absent when it is committed. R. v. Clayton, 1 C. & K. 128. R. v. Moland, 2 Mood. 276.

stated, ante, p. 131 note(j), as to felonies.

CANADIAN NOTES.

OF PARTIES TO THE COMMISSION OF CRIME.

Sec. 1.—Preliminary.

Innocent Agent.—As to freedom from criminal responsibility, see notes to the last preceding chapter.

Sec. 2.—Principals and Accessories before the Fact.

See Code sec. 69. (This section is subject to secs. 17 and 18 of the Code, as to children.)

This section makes any person who does an act for the purpose of aiding any other person to commit an offence or who abets any other person in commission of an offence, a party to the offence committed by such other person. To abet is to be personally or constructively present at the commission of an offence, and to assist in the criminal act; but to aid is to help, or in any way to promote, facilitate or bring about the accomplishment of any criminal purpose by another, and this may be done without being present when the offence is perpetrated. Under the old rule of law the abettor, or the person who was present inciting or helping, was a principal in the second degree, while the person who, being absent, counselled, helped or facilitated in any way the commission of an offence which was afterwards perpetrated was an accessory before the fact. R. v. Roy, 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 472.

To counsel and procure a person to commit an offence constitutes the counsellor or inciter a party to the offence, when it is committed; and by this section he can be proceeded against as a principal. The Queen v. Gregory, L.R. 1 C.C.R. 79.

The words aider, abettor, accessory and accomplice as applied to crimes, are often used as having the same meaning. But they are by no means synonymous. It is unlawful to aid or encourage the commission of a crime. It is unlawful under certain circumstances to conceal the commission of a crime. One who aids is, in ordinary language, called an aider or abettor. An accessory is one who takes an active, but subordinate, part. An accomplice, according to the ordinary meaning of the word, would seem to imply one who not only takes an active part, but positively aids in the accomplishment or completion of the crime. R. v. Smith, 38 U.C.Q.B. 281, 287.

To make a person an "aider and abettor" he must have been present actually or constructively. A person is present in construction of law aiding and abetting if with the intention of giving assistance, he is near enough to afford it should occasion arise, or to favour the escape of those who were immediately engaged; he would be a principal in the second degree. Per MacMahon, J., in R. v. Lloyd, 19 O.R. 352.

If a person sees that a crime is about to be committed in his presence and does not interfere to prevent it, that is not a participation rendering him liable, without evidence that he was there in pursuance of a common unlawful purpose with the principal offender. R. v. Curtley, 27 U.C.Q.B. 613.

Aid rendered to the principal offenders after the commission of the crime is alone insufficient to justify a conviction of the person so aided as a principal under this section. R. v. Graham, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 388.

On an indictment for, with three other persons, attempting to steal goods in a store, evidence was given by an accomplice that prisoner went with him to see a store, that prisoner went into the store to buy something to see how the store could be got into, and that they and others planned the robbery and fixed the date; the prisoner saw them off, but did not go with them; the others went out and made the attempt, which was frustrated. It was held that as those actually engaged were guilty of the attempt to steal, the prisoner was properly convicted under 27 and 28 Vict. ch. 19, sec. 9, which enacted that whosoever shall aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of any misdemeanour shall be liable to be tried, indicted and punished as a principal offender. R. v. Esmonde, 26 U.C.Q.B. 152.

A person who knowingly assists a thief to conceal stolen money which he is in the actual and proximate act of carrying away, by receiving money for the purpose of concealing it, is guilty of aiding and abetting in theft and may under sub-sec. (c) be convicted as a principal. R. v. Campbell, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 357.

Although the theft may be complete by the mere taking and carrying away of stolen property the subsequent carrying of same to a place of concealment by a person who did not participate in the taking, if done with a guilty knowledge and as a continuation of and proximately at the same time as the theft is an "aiding and abetting" of the same. Ibid.

An act done which may enter into the offence, although the crime may be complete without it, may be considered as a continuation of the criminal transaction so as to make the participator an aider and abettor, although his participation occurs only after such acts have been done as in themselves would constitute the crime. Ibid.

If the accused were not an aider and abettor or a principal in the second degree in the commission of the theft, the circumstance that he was an accessory before the fact by counselling and procuring the commission of the theft, and therefore liable under sec. 69 to be convicted as a principal, does not prevent his conviction for the substantive offence of afterwards receiving the stolen property knowing it to have been stolen. Such an accessory before the fact who afterwards becomes a receiver of the stolen property may be legally convicted both of the theft and of "receiving." R. v. Hodge, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 350. Note.—The theft here was complete before the "receiving."

If it be contrary to law to sell liquor or any other article in a shop, a sale by any clerk or assistant in his shop would primâ facie be the act of the shopkeeper. It may be, if he could shew that the act of selling was an isolated act wholly unauthorized by him, and not in any way in the course of his business, but a thing done wholly by the unwarranted or wilful act of the subordinate he might escape personal responsibility. Where one H. swore that he got a bottle of brandy and paid for it one dollar in K.'s shop, that a woman served him, and no one else was in the store at the time, K. was convicted and the Court upheld the conviction. R. v. King, 20 U.C.C.P. 247.

In R. v. Williams, 42 U.C.Q.B. 462, it was said that whereas both employer and employed may be liable, yet both ought not to be punished for the same offence.

In R. v. King, 20 U.C.C.P. 246, the accused was convicted for a sale in his absence by his son, the statute enacting a presumption of authority by the father which the magistrate held was not rebutted by the direct evidence of the father, on which he did not rely.

A broker who merely acts as such for two parties, one a buyer the other a seller, without having any pecuniary interest in the transaction beyond his fixed commission, and without any guilty knowledge on his part of the intention of the contracting parties, to gamble in stocks and merchandise, is not liable as an accessory. R. v. Dowd, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 170.

Common Purpose.—Where a parcel containing revolvers was thrown into a cab conveying prisoners, and the accused and at least one of the other prisoners in the cab armed themselves with the revolvers and formed the common intention of prosecuting the unlawful purpose of escaping from lawful custody, by the use thereof, and of assisting each other therein, the shooting by one of them of the constable in charge was an offence committed by one of them in the prosecution of such common purpose, and the commission thereof was or ought to have been known to be a possible consequence of the prosecution of such common purpose; each of them was, therefore, a party to such offence, and the offence being murder in the actual perpetrator thereof, was murder in the defendant, even if he were not an actual perpetrator thereof, and he was properly found guilty by the jury of that offence. R. v. Rice, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 509, 4 O.L.R. 223.

Trade Mark Offences.—No servant of a master, resident in Canada, who bonâ fide acts in obedience to the instructions of such master, and, on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, gives full information as to his master, is liable to any prosecution or punishment for any offence defined in the part of the Code relating to trade mark offences, sec. 495.

Liability of an Accessory before the Fact where the Principal does not Follow the Preconcerted Plan.—Code sec. 70.

Commission of Crime other than that Commanded.—See Code sec. 70(2).

Accessory after the Fact.—See Code secs. 71, 76, 267, 574, 575, 849.

Misprision of Felony.—The Code makes no provision as to this. The common law, therefore, is still in force concerning it. Burbidge on Criminal Law, 508.

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

OF ATTEMPTING, CONSPIRING, AND INCITING TO COMMIT CRIMES.

PRELIMINARY.

For the purposes of classification and punishment a distinction is drawn between completed crimes in cases in which the whole of that which was intended has been successfully done, and those preparations to commit crimes which are punishable, although the complete offence has not been accomplished, e.g., where there has been a conspiracy, an incitement, or an attempt to accomplish the complete offence.

In the case of high treason, no distinction is drawn between the attempt, incitement, or conspiracy and the full offence, such acts as could in other cases be evidence of inchoate crime being treated as overt acts of high treason (a). All attempts, incitements, or conspiracies to commit felony or misdemeanor are indictable as misdemeanors at common law unless a statute directs that the particular form of attempt, &c., shall be treated as a felony. In the case of an unsuccessful attempt or incitement to commit crime, it would seem that the law as to aiders and abettors (ante, p. 138) is applicable in the same manner as in the case of completed crimes, and when the attempt or incitement is made felony by statute the law as to accessories would seem to apply (ante, p. 116).

A.—ATTEMPTS TO COMMIT CRIME.

It is a misdemeanor indictable at common law to attempt to commit any felony (b), including felo de se (c), or any misdemeanor (d), whether such felony or misdemeanor is an offence at common law or is created by statute (e). In certain cases which will be stated in later chapters the attempt to commit an offence is by statute punishable in the same manner as the completed offence, or is specifically punished as a substantive felony or misdemeanor (ee).

(a) This rule is expressed by the phrase, 'voluntas reputatur pro facto,' and seems, by early writers, to have been extended to homicide. 'Sed hæc voluntas non intellecta fuit de voluntate nudis verbis aut scriptis propalata sed mundo manifestata fuit per apertum factum.' 3 Co. Inst. 5. Fost. 193.

(b) R. v. Higgins, 2 East, 5, 21. R. v. Kinnersley, 1 Str. 196. 1 Hawk. c. 25, s. 3. That attempts to commit felony are indictable misdemeanors is recognised by the statute empowering Courts to award imprisonment with hard labour for such attempts. 3 Geo. IV. c. 114, post, p. 212.

(c) R. v. Burgess, L. & C. 258. R. v. Doody, 6 Cox, 463.

(d) In R. v. Scofield [1784], Cald. 397, 403, Lord Mansfield denied the validity of a distinction drawn between acts done with intent to commit a felony and acts done with intent to commit a misdemeanor.

(ee) e.g., 8 Edw. VII. c. 45, s. 1(3), post, p. 973.

No act is indictable as an attempt¹ to commit felony or misdemeanor, unless it is a step towards the execution of his criminal purpose (f), and as an act directly approximating to, or immediately connected with, the commission of the offence which the person doing it has in view. There must be an overt act intentionally done towards the commission of some offence; one or more of a series of acts which would constitute the crime if the accused were not prevented by interruption (f), or physical impossibility, or did not fail for some other cause in completing his criminal purpose.

In R. v. McPherson (g), it was held that a prisoner could not be properly convicted of breaking and entering a building and attempting to steal goods which were not there. It was at one time considered that when the full offence was physically impossible, there could be no conviction for the attempt. In R. v. Collins (h), it was held that a man who, with intent to steal put his hand into an empty pocket, could not be convicted of an attempt to steal. But in R. v. Brown (i), it was held that the prisoner had properly been convicted of the statutory misdemeanor of (f) Where a particular intent is an essential element in the definition of the completed crime, certain difficulties arise in applying the rule as to attempts. If a man in a sudden passion struck at another with a knife, and his hand was arrested, it would be an attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm, and yet there might be no intent to inflict grievous bodily harm, but the intent might be to prevent apprehension or otherwise. There is in short such an offence as attempting to wound with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and another offence of attempting to inflict grievous bodily harm without that particular intent. So also by statute a felony is committed by any one who throws a stone upon a railway line with intent to obstruct an engine, and a person might be found guilty of attempting to commit that felony. But by the same statute a misdemeanor is committed by any one who obstructs an engine, and a person might be found guilty of attempting to obstruct an engine, although he had no intent to obstruct it; but if he has attempted to do an act which would end if uninterfered with in an offence within the section, he has committed an attempt to obstruct, and his attempt involves no doubt an intentional act, but it is not a felonious

'intent to obstruct' within the meaning of the felony section, but an implied intent to do what is forbidden by the misdemeanor section. And see 1 Hawk. c. 55. Some boys were indicted at Derby (1875) March Assizes, for throwing the coping-stone off a bridge upon the railway, with intent to obstruct an engine. They were only 'larking,' and the jury negatived the 'intent to obstruct.' They were also indicted for obstructing, but as it happened the stone fell so as not to obstruct the line, the learned counsel for the prosecution submitted that they might be found guilty of attempting to obstruct; but the learned commissioner thought that as the jury had negatived the intent to obstruct, they could not be found guilty of the attempt. But it is submitted that if the jury thought the prisoners wilfully tried to throw the stone upon the line, they might have been found guilty of the attempt, as the probable consequence of throwing the stone on the line would be the obstruction of the engine. *MS. AMERICAN NOTE.

unlawful object done with the intent or purpose of accomplishing it, a person taking that step with that intent or purpose, and himself capable of doing every act on his part to accomplish that object, cannot protect himself from responsibility by showing that by reason of some fact unknown to him at the time of his criminal attempt it could not be fully carried into effect in the particular instance.' See C. v. Jacobs, 9 Allen (Mass.), 274.

attempting to commit an unnatural offence, although on physical grounds perpetration of the complete offence was impossible; and R. v. Collins was declared no longer law. And in R. v. Ring (j), a conviction for attempt to steal from a woman unknown by hustling her and endeavouring to find her pocket, was held good, and R. v. Collins was stated to be overruled (k). In R. v. Ring there was also a count for assault with intent to commit a felony.

A man may have in his mind a criminal purpose to commit a felony or misdemeanor, but so long as that purpose rests in bare intention (l), he does not become amenable to the criminal law (m). Attempting to commit a crime is distinct from intending to commit it (n).

In Dugdale v. R. (o), the defendant was charged (1) with preserving and keeping in his possession obscene prints, with intent unlawfully to utter the same, and (2) with obtaining and procuring obscene prints with a like intent. It was held that the first set of charges were bad, for they were consistent with the possibility that the prisoner might have originally had the prints in his possession with an innocent intention, and there was no act shewn to be done which could be considered as the first step in the commission of a misdemeanor; but that the second set of charges were good, for the procuring of such prints was an act done in the commencement of a misdemeanor.

Questions have arisen whether the possession of materials or implements for coining or house-breaking for the purpose of committing these offences, can without more be treated as criminal at common law. The preponderating weight of the decided cases is against considering possession as such an act as would constitute the offence of attempting or preparing for, the commission of the full offence. In R. v. Sutton (p), the defendant was indicted for having coining instruments in his custody, with intent to coin half guineas, shillings and sixpences, and to utter them as and for the current coin, Lord Hardwicke, who tried the case, doubted what the offence was. But the Court of King's Bench held the offence to be a misdemeanor; Lee, J., saying, that 'all that was necessary in such a case was an act charged, and a criminal intention joined to that act' (q). This doctrine, if correct, does not appear to have been applicable to the facts of the case as charged, which did not amount to a criminal act by the defendant. It appears to have been accepted by Lord Mansfield as good law in R. v. Scofield (r) : but R. v. Sutton was disapproved in R. v. Stewart (s), where it was held that having counterfeit silver in possession with intent to utter it as good is no offence, there being no criminal act done. The prisoner had been found guilty of unlawfully having in possession counterfeit silver coin with intent to utter it as good : but the judges were of opinion that there must be some act done to constitute a crime, and that the having in possession only was not an act (s).

Legislation has been passed with respect to persons having implements for house-breaking, &c., in their possession with a felonious intent. The Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 4), makes persons having in their possession implements of house-breaking or weapons with intent (t) to commit any felonious act, liable to summary conviction as rogues and vagabonds. Sect. 58 of the Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), makes persons armed with offensive weapons, or in possession of implements of house-breaking, guilty of a misdemeanor. And in some instances an act, accompanied with a certain intent, has been made a felony by particular statutes ; as by sect. 38 of the same Act, the severing with intent to steal the ore of any metal, or any coal, &c., from any mine, bed, or vein thereof, is made felony punishable by two years' imprisonment (with or without hard labour). And by sect. 14 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), damaging certain articles in the course of manufacture, with intent to destroy them, and entering certain places with intent to commit such offence, is made felony.

In R. v. Hensler (u), the defendant was held to have been rightly convicted of attempting to obtain money by false pretences contained in a begging letter, though he had, in fact, received money in answer to a letter from the recipient who knew the pretence to be false (v).

In R. v. Williams (w), it was held that a boy under fourteen could not, by reason of his age, be convicted of a felony under sect. 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69) ; but Hawkins, J., with the apparent concurrence of Cave, J., seems to have been prepared to hold when the case arose that the boy might, under sect. 9 of the Act, be convicted of an attempt to commit a felony within sect. 4. Coleridge, L.C.J., seems to have been of a contrary opinion (x).

The question in each case is whether the acts relied on constituting the attempt were done with intent to commit the complete offence, and as one or more of a series of acts or omissions directly forming some of the necessary steps towards completing that offence, but falling short

(v) Blackburn, J., said, 'You may attempt to steal from a man who is too strong to permit you.' Mellor, J., said, 'An attempt may be made to steal a watch that is too strongly fastened by a guard. Here the prosecutor had the money, and was capable of being deceived, and the prisoner attempted to deceive him.' Kelly, C.B., said, 'So soon as ever the letter was put in the post the attempt was committed.'

of completion by the intervention of causes outside the volition of the accused, or because the offender of his own free will desisted from completion of his criminal purpose for some reason other than mere change of mind.

In R. v. Eagleton (y), a baker was indicted for attempting to obtain money by false pretences. He had contracted with a poor law authority to deliver loaves of a certain weight to poor people, in exchange for tickets given to them by the relieving officer, which the baker was to retain on delivering the loaves, and to present weekly to the relieving officer as vouchers for payment, with a statement of the amount of the loaves. The amount shewn by the statement and vouchers was credited to the baker, and was payable at a later date, subject to a right to make deductions for breach of contract. The defendant had delivered to the poor short weight against the tickets presented, and returned to the relieving officer the tickets received. It was held that he was guilty of attempting to obtain money by false pretences by fraudulently obtaining credit with the relieving officer for a weight of bread in excess of that delivered, on the ground that the baker had done the last act depending on himself towards obtaining payment, and that that act was sufficiently proximate to (and) or not too remote from the offence of obtaining money by false pretences (z).

In R. v. Cheeseman (a), the prisoner was servant to an army meat contractor, who, in the course of his duties, took meat daily into camp, where it was weighed by a quartermaster-sergeant, for distribution to the troops, and the surplus meat, after satisfying the day's requirements, was to be taken back to the contractor. The prisoner fraudulently falsified the scales used so as to give the troops short weight, and to leave a larger surplus for return to the contractor. His intention was to appropriate the difference between the just surplus and the actual surplus. The fraud was detected and he absconded. It was held that he was guilty of an attempt to steal the difference, as he had done all that was necessary to complete his criminal purpose, except to carry away and dispose of the proceeds of the fraud, which he would have done if not interrupted by detection of his scheme.

In R. v. Taylor (b), a man was tried for the statutory felony of attempting to set fire to a stack of corn, on proof that he had asked for work and money of the prosecutor, and, on refusal, threatened to burn him up, and that he was then seen to go to a stack, and kneeling down close to it to light a lucifer match, though, on seeing that he was watched, he blew out the match and went away. Pollock, C.B., ruled that to warrant a conviction, the act must be one tending directly and immediately to the execution of the principal crime, and done under such circumstances that the prisoner had the power of carrying his intention into execution (c).

Certain acts done in furtherance of a criminal purpose have been held to be indictable misdemeanors, which cannot exactly be described as attempts, but are closely analogous. Such are abandoning a child without food with intent that it may die (d); making a false oath before a surrogate to obtain a marriage licence (e); procuring dies for the purpose of counterfeiting coin (f); procuring indecent prints for the purpose of publishing them (g); handing poison to A., and endeavouring to get A. to administer it to B. (h), attempting to bribe a Cabinet minister and member of the Privy Council to give the defendant an office in the Colonies (i); promising money to a member of a corporation to vote for the election of B. as mayor (j); attempting, by bribery, to influence a jurymen in giving his verdict (k); or a judge in his decision (l); or attempting to bribe a customs officer (m). Certain acts intended or calculated to pervert, delay, or defeat the course of justice which are regarded as indictable (n), as being attempts to the prejudice of the community (o), are separately treated, post, Book VII. p. 537. A fraudulent attempt to get a conviction set aside by means of false declarations has, in Australia, been held to be a misdemeanor at common law (p), on the authority of O'Mealy v. Newell (q).

The cases where an attempt to commit crime is a misdemeanor at common law are distinct from those in which by statute an act is made felony, if done with a certain intent, but a misdemeanor if done without such intent. The criminal quality of the completed act in such cases varies with the intent with which it was done.

Whether the attempt is a common-law misdemeanor or a statutory offence, the rules already stated as to what is sufficient to constitute an attempt apply, unless the statute dealing with the subject-matter provides another criterion (r).

Attempts to murder, which at common law are misdemeanors, are dealt with as felonies in unnecessary detail in ss. 11-15 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (s).

On an indictment for an attempt it is unnecessary to negative the commission of the full offence (t): and it is for the defendant to shew, if he please, that the minor was merged in the greater offence.

B.—OF CRIMINAL CONSPIRACIES.

Criminal conspiracy consists in 'an unlawful combination of two or more persons (u), to do that which is contrary to law, to cause a public mischief (v), or to do that which is wrongful and harmful towards another person' (w), or to do a lawful act for an unlawful end (x), or by unlawful means (y), or wrongfully to prejudice a third person (z). It has even been said that if several illegally concur in doing an act with a common object, they may be guilty of conspiracy, though they were previously unacquainted with each other (a). But few things are left so doubtful in the criminal law as the point at which a combination of several persons for a common object becomes unlawful (b).

The best established definition of the offence is that given by Willes, J., on behalf of all the judges in Mulcahy v. R. (c), and accepted by the House of Lords in that (d) and subsequent cases (e).

'A conspiracy consists not merely in the intention of two or more, but in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. So long as a design rests in intention only it is not indictable. When two agree to carry it into effect, the very plot is an act in itself, and the act of each of the parties, promise against promise, actus contra actum, capable of being enforced if lawful, punishable if for a criminal object or for the use of criminal means (f). And so far as proof goes conspiracy, as Grose, J., said in R. v. Brisac (g), (u) Husband and wife are regarded as one person and as incapable of conspiring together (1 Hawk. c. 72, s. 8), though they can severally or jointly conspire with other persons. R. v. Whitehouse, 6 Cox, 38, Platt, B.

Vincent*, 9 C. & P. 91, Alderson, B., laid it down that conspiracy is 'a crime which consists either in a combination and agreement by persons to do some illegal act, or a combination and agreement to effect a legal purpose by illegal means.' In O'Connell v. R. (11 Cl. & F. 155 ; 5 St. Tr. (N.S.) 1), Tindal, C.J., in delivering the opinion of all the judges, said : 'The crime of conspiracy is complete if two, or more than two, should agree to do an illegal thing ; that is, to effect something in itself unlawful, or to effect, by unlawful means, something which in itself may be indifferent or even lawful.' In R. v. Seward, 1 A. & E. 713, Denman, C.J., said, 'An indictment for conspiracy ought to show either that it was for an unlawful purpose, or to effect a lawful purpose by unlawful means ;' but in R. v. Peck, 9 A. & E. 686, upon this dictum being cited he said, 'I do not think the antithesis very correct ;' and in R. v. King, 7 Q.B. 782, he said, 'The words "at least" should accompany that statement.' In R. v. Jones, 4 B. & Ad. 345 ; 1 N. & M. 78, however, several judges gave a similar definition of the crime of conspiracy. C. S. G.

is generally "a matter of inference deduced from certain criminal acts of the parties accused, done in pursuance of an apparent criminal purpose in common between them" (h). The number and the compact give weight, and cause danger, and this is more especially the case in a conspiracy like that charged in this indictment.' The gist of the offence of conspiracy then lies, not in doing the act, or effecting the purpose for which the conspiracy is formed, nor in attempting to do them, nor in inciting others to do them, but in the forming of the scheme or agreement between the parties (i). The external or overt act of the crime is concert by which mutual consent to a common purpose is exchanged (j). In an indictment, it suffices if the combination exists and is unlawful, because it is the combination itself which is mischievous, and which gives the public an interest to interfere by indictment (k).

In order to make any person criminally responsible for conspiracy, it is essential to establish that he entered into an agreement falling within the above definition with one or more other persons (l), whether charged with him in the indictment or not, and whether known or unknown (m). So where two persons were indicted for conspiring together (no other parties being alleged), and one was convicted, and the jury disagreed as to the other, it was held that the conviction of the one could not stand (n); and where three were charged jointly with conspiring together, and one pleaded guilty, but the other two were tried and acquitted, it was held that the sentence imposed on the one who had pleaded guilty could not stand (o). As a matter of procedure it would seem that if A. be indicted and tried alone for conspiring with others, he could be lawfully convicted, though the others referred to or included in the indictment had not appeared or pleaded (p), or were dead before (q) or after the indictment was preferred (r), or before pleading not guilty (s), or were subsequently and separately tried. But it is not settled whether, in cases of separate trials of the conspirators, the acquittal of those tried later would avoid the conviction of one earlier tried and convicted for the same conspiracy (t). When the indictment alleges a conspiracy between several, a verdict that two or more, but not all, entered into the conspiracy will support a conviction (u).

In R. v. Sudbury (v), where only two out of three were found guilty of riot and there was no allegation of cum aliis, judgment was arrested. (w) 16 Q.B. 832, Erle, J., diss. Campbell, C.J., Patteson, J., and Coleridge, J., rested the decision on the ground that 'other persons' must mean persons other than Tillotson and Maddock; and that the acquittal of those defendants, therefore, must have the same effect as if Thompson, Tillotson and Maddock had alone been charged with the conspiracy; in which case it was clear Thompson must have been acquitted. Campbell, C.J., said: 'The acquittal of two involves the acquittal of the third,' and Patteson, J., said: 'I cannot see how Thompson can be convicted of conspiring with persons unknown; upon the evidence he conspired, if at all, with Tillotson or Maddock.' Erle, J., was of opinion that, 'according to the rules of pleading, this charge, as to each individual, must be construed as if he were charged solely, and it follows that the acquittal of the two becomes immaterial; and the verdict may be found in any terms comprised in the indictment. The finding may be that Thompson conspired with Tillotson, or with Maddock, or with other persons unknown; and so there may be similar findings as to the others. Therefore if any one be found guilty, the verdict must stand as against him; the judge must take the opinion of the jury as to each, whatever may be the finding as to the others. "Are you of opinion that Thompson conspired with Tillotson?" "No." "With Maddock?"

"No. But we are satisfied that he conspired with some one; we do not know whom." The conspiracy, then, cannot be truly predicated of either Tillotson or Maddock, because the jury do not know which of these two was the conspirator; they do, however, know that one of them was; so that against Thompson, the verdict should be that he conspired with some one, it is not known with whom.' R. v. Thompson was accepted as good law in R. v. Plummer [1902], 2 K.B. 339, 343, 345, and the criticisms on R. v. Thompson by Mr. Greaves, in the 4th edition of this work (vol. iii. p. 146), were treated as ill-founded in law. He said: 'It is quite an error to suppose that the word "other," as used in indictments, means "different from." It is a mere word of form, used like "further" and "afterwards." See R. v. Downing, 1 Den. 52. If the indictment had contained three counts, the first alleging a conspiracy between Thompson and Tillotson, the second between Thompson and Maddock, and the third between Thompson and divers other persons to the jurors unknown, and the facts had been as in this case, the verdict must have been not guilty on the first two counts, and guilty on the third; and yet each count in this indictment was in point of law exactly the same as such three counts.'

'The authorities seem to show, that if several persons are indicted for a riot or a conspiracy, and the jury acquit all except two in riot and one in conspiracy, the latter must also be acquitted. It is very confidently submitted that these authorities rest on a fallacy, viz., that because some are acquitted, therefore the others could not have been guilty of the offence together with those that are acquitted. The acquittal of A. necessarily amounts to no more than that A. was not proved to be guilty. Suppose A. and B. are indicted for a con-

B., and C. conspired, &c., 'with divers other persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown.' The jury stated their opinion, upon the evidence, to be that A. had conspired with either B. or C., but that they did not know with which. No evidence was given of participation by any other party; and thereon the judge directed a verdict of not guilty as to B. and C., and a verdict of guilty as to A.; and it was held that as B. and C. had been acquitted, the verdict could not be supported against A.

In R. v. Cooke (x), on an indictment against four for a conspiracy, two pleaded not guilty; one pleaded in abatement, to which plea there was a demurrer; and the fourth never appeared. Before the argument of the demurrer the record was taken down for trial, and one of the defendants who had pleaded not guilty acquitted, and the other found guilty of conspiracy with him who had pleaded in abatement. The demurrer was afterwards argued, and judgment of respondeat ouster given, whereupon a plea of not guilty was pleaded. The Court of King's Bench held that judgment might be pronounced upon the one found guilty before the trial of the other; for although it was possible that the latter might be acquitted, yet the Court were not warranted in coming to the conclusion that that would be so against the verdict that had been found, or in forbearing to pronounce judgment upon the defendant found guilty (x). In R. v. Ahearne (y), where three prisoners were indicted in Ireland for the (then capital) offence of conspiring to murder, and, having refused to join in their challenges, one of them was tried alone and convicted; it was held, on a case reserved, that he had been properly tried and convicted, and that there was no ground for respiting or arresting the judgment.

In R. v. Quinn (z), also an Irish case, the indictment was against eight persons for conspiring together to defraud a railway company by spiracy, and A. has made a written confession that he did conspire with B., and B. with him, but the evidence fails as against B., is A. to be acquitted? Suppose, in such a case, A. had pleaded guilty, is his plea to be set aside because B. for want of evidence is acquitted? This shows that in fact one may be guilty, though the rest are acquitted, and that the doctrine in question rests on an entire fallacy.' This reasoning has been rejected as involving the dangerous theory that a verdict of not guilty does not fully establish the innocence of the person to whom it relates. R. v. Plummer [1902], 2 K.B. 339, 349, Bruce, J. See R. v. Stoddart [1909], 25 T. L. R. 612. Again it is conceived that a still more fatal objection to the doctrine exists. It is apprehended that the acquittal of B. can in no case be admissible in evidence for A. It is obvious that the conviction of A. would not be evidence against B. And the rule is, that 'no record of a conviction or verdict can be given in evidence, but such whereof the benefit may be mutual.' See R. v. Warden of the Fleet, Holt, 133; and other cases, 2 Phill. Evid. c. 1, s. 1.

(x) 5 B. & C. 538. 7 D. & R. 673. Little-dale, J., said, 'If the other defendant shall hereafter be acquitted, perhaps this judgment may be reversed.' Mr. Greaves (Russell on Crimes (4th ed.), vol. iii. p. 146) queried this ruling on grounds to a large extent equally applicable to the case of a joint trial, saying: 'Such acquittal would not necessarily show that the verdict of guilty on the former trial was wrong, as witnesses might be dead or absent who were examined on the former trial, or the one defendant might have been convicted on his own confession, which would not be admissible against the other defendant.' But in R. v. Plummer [1902], 2 K.B. 239, 345, Wright, J., considered the criticism not justified by the authorities already stated in the text.

(y) [1852] 6 Cox, 6: 2 Ir. Rep. C. L. 381. In R. v. Plummer [1902], 2 K.B. 339, 344, Wright, J., seems to have wrongly inferred from the fact that the prisoners were sentenced to death, that the indictment was for murder.

stealing and selling uncanceled but used railway tickets. Three were convicted of conspiracy, two of misdemeanor, and two were acquitted. It was ruled that the count was good and was sustainable by a finding that two or more were concerned in the conspiracy charged.

In R. v. Duguid (a), it was held that D. could lawfully be convicted of conspiring with the mother of a child under fourteen to take the child by force from the possession of its lawful guardian, although sect. 56 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, under which such abduction is criminal, contains an express provision excepting from criminal liability a person who shall have claimed any right to the possession of such child. The mother was not tried with D. nor amenable to justice. The Court did not determine whether the mother came within the exception, but ruled that her immunity if established had no legal bearing on the question whether a conspiracy by D. with her to commit the statutory crime was criminal so far as concerned D (aa).

In consequence of the nature of the crime, it has been held where an indictment for conspiracy was tried in the Court of King's Bench, a new trial granted as to one of several convicted of conspiracy operated as a grant of a new trial as to the others convicted, although the grounds for the grant of the new trial applied only to the one. But where of those indicted for conspiracy some were convicted and some acquitted, the grant of a new trial in favour of those convicted did not affect the verdict of acquittal (b). A new trial can no longer be granted in England on conviction of any criminal offence (c); but the principles involved in the above rulings may have to be considered in the event of an appeal by one conspirator where several have been convicted.

Conspiracies to commit Offences Punishable by the Criminal Law.—Whatever doubt may exist as to other forms of conspiracy, it is clearly established that every conspiracy to commit an offence punishable by law is an indictable offence. Where the conspiracy is executed, it appears to merge in the completed offence (d). Conspiracies of this kind are merely auxiliary to the law which creates the principal crime (e).

It is immaterial whether the principal offence is a felony (f) or a misdemeanor (g), or whether it is an offence at common law or by statute (h), and whether punishable on indictment or on summary conviction (i), or brevi manu, as in the case of contempt of court. And this form of conspiracy includes combination to violate the provisions of a statute (j), or of a by-law made, or a proclamation issued, under statutory authority, if the violation of the statute, by-law, &c., is a misdemeanor at common law, or visited by a specific criminal penalty (k); and also extends to include combination to commit a breach of the peace (l). The fact that conspiracy to commit felony is indictable, was recognised by the provision for payment out of public funds of the costs of prosecuting such an offence (14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 2). A person may be convicted of conspiracy to commit a crime of which he could not, if he stood alone, be convicted. Thus, a woman has been held to have been properly convicted of conspiring with others to administer drugs to herself, or use instruments to herself, with intent to procure abortion (m), when it was proved that she believed erroneously that she was with child (n).

Convictions have been had for conspiracies to poison human beings (o) or horses (p), to commit forgery (q), larceny (r), marine barratry with intent to defraud underwriters (s), and prison breach (t), and to form an unlawful assembly (u). Conspiracy to murder is a statutory felony (v), as are certain combinations or agreements for the purpose of treason, felony, or sedition (post, p. 327).

In R. v. Brailsford (w), it was held to be criminal for two to conspire to obtain a passport from the Foreign Office in the name of one of them by falsely pretending that he desired to travel in Russia, and with intent that the passport should be used by another person. The passport was obtained and sent to the other person and used in Russia by a revolutionist. The conspiracy was laid as being in fraud of the Foreign Office to the injury, prejudice, and disturbance of the lawful free and customary intercourse between the King's subjects and those of the Czar, and to the public mischief of the King's subjects, and to the endangerment of peaceful relations between the King and Czar, and between their respective subjects. It was argued for the Crown that the offence was indictable at common law independently of conspiracy (x). This contention the Court considered well founded as to frauds and cheats, and apparently as to any other acts tending to produce a public mischief (y), and held that obtaining a passport by a false pretence, i.e., cheating and deceiving the Foreign Office, was an act which would render a conspiracy to carry it into effect criminal, and that the particular conspiracy was clearly calculated and intended to produce a grave public mischief, because it sought to obtain by false representations and improper purpose the issue of a public document by a public department of state.

Conspiracy for seditious purposes is indictable, sedition itself being a criminal offence (z). In R. v. Vincent (a), some of the counts of an indictment charged the defendant with conspiring to cause a great number of persons to meet together for the purpose of exciting discontent and disaffection in the minds of the subjects of the Queen, and for the purpose of exciting the said subjects to hatred and contempt of the government and constitution, and it appeared that a large number of persons had assembled at meetings, at which violent speeches had been made respecting the government and constitution and the people's charter. Alderson, B., told the jury, 'The purpose which the defendants had in view, as stated by the prosecutors, was to excite disaffection and discontent, but the defendants say that their purpose was by reasonable argument and proper petitions to obtain the five points mentioned by their learned counsel. If that were so, I think it is by no means illegal to petition on those points. The duration of Parliaments and the extent of the elective franchise have undergone more than one change by the authority of Parliament itself; and with respect to the voting by ballot, persons whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect are found to differ (b). There can also be no illegality in petitioning that members of Parliament should be paid for their services by their constituents; indeed, they were so paid in ancient times, and they were not required to have a property qualification till the reign of Queen Anne (c), and are now not required to have it in order to represent any part of Scotland or the English Universities.' And he directed the jury to say whether they were satisfied that the defendants conspired to excite disaffection, and if they were to find them guilty of conspiracy.

The first count in an indictment against Daniel O'Connell (d) and others alleged that the defendants, intending to create discontent and disaffection amongst the subjects of the Queen, and to excite the said subjects to hatred of the government and constitution, &c., unlawfully and seditiously did conspire, &c., to create discontent and disaffection amongst the subjects of the Queen, and to excite such subjects to hatred and contempt of the government and constitution and to unlawful and seditious opposition to the government and constitution, and to stir up jealousies and ill-will between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and especially to promote among Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland feelings of ill-will and hostility towards and against Her Majesty's subjects in the other parts of the United Kingdom, and especially in that part called England and further, to excite discontent and disaffection amongst divers of Her Majesty's subjects serving in the army ; and further, to cause and procure, &c., divers subjects unlawfully and seditiously to meet and assemble together in large numbers, at different places in Ireland, for the unlawful and seditious purpose of obtaining, by means of the intimidation to be thereby caused, and by means of the exhibition of great physical force at such assemblies and meetings, changes and alterations in the government, laws, and constitution ; and further, to bring into hatred and disrepute the courts by law established in Ireland for the administration of justice, and to diminish the confidence of the said subjects in Ireland in the administration of the law therein, with the intent to induce the subjects to withdraw the adjudication of their differences from the cognizance of the said courts, and to submit the same to the determination of other tribunals to be constituted for that purpose. The count then alleged various overt acts done in order to excite discontent with, hatred of, and disaffection to the government, laws, and constitution. The second count was exactly like the first, but omitted the overt acts. The third count alleged that the defendants, intending to create discontent and disaffection amongst the subjects of the Queen, and to excite the said subjects to hatred and contempt of the government and constitution, &c., unlawfully and seditiously did conspire, &c., to raise and create discontent and disaffection amongst the subjects of the Queen, and to excite such subjects to hatred and contempt of the government and constitution, and to unlawful and seditious opposition to the said government and constitution, and to stir up hatred, jealousies, and ill-will between different classes of the said subjects, and especially to promote amongst the said subjects in Ireland feelings of ill-will and hostility against the said subjects in other parts of the United Kingdom, and especially in that part called England ; and further, to excite discontent and disaffection amongst divers subjects serving in Her Majesty's army ; and further, to cause and procure, &c., divers subjects to meet and assemble together in large numbers at different places in Ireland, for the unlawful and seditious purpose of obtaining, by means of the intimidation to be thereby caused, and by means of the exhibition of great physical force at such assemblies and meetings, changes in the government, laws, and constitution ; and further, to bring into hatred and disrepute the courts in Ireland for the administration of justice, &c. The fourth count was the same as the third, omitting the charges as to creating discontent in the army, and the diminishing the confidence in the courts of law. The fifth count alleged that the defendants, intending to cause and create discontent and disaffection amongst the liege subjects of the Queen, and to excite the said subjects to hatred and contempt of the government and constitution, &c., unlawfully and seditiously did conspire, &c., to raise and create discontent and disaffection amongst the liege subjects of the Queen, and to excite the said subjects to hatred and contempt of the government and constitution, and to unlawful and seditious opposition to the government and constitution, and also to stir up jealousies, hatred, and ill-will between different classes of the said subjects, and especially to promote amongst the said subjects in Ireland feelings of ill-will and hostility against the subjects in the other parts of the United Kingdom, and especially in England. Tindal, C.J., in expressing to the House of Lords the opinion of the consulted judges, said : ‘ There can be no question but that the charges contained in the first five counts do amount, in each, to the legal offence of conspiracy, and are sufficiently described therein. There can be no doubt but that the agreeing of divers persons together to raise discontent and disaffection amongst the liege subjects of the Queen, to stir up jealousies, hatred, and ill-will between different classes of Her Majesty’s subjects, and especially to promote amongst Her Majesty’s subjects in Ireland feelings of ill-will and hostility towards Her Majesty’s subjects in other parts of the United Kingdom, and especially in England—which charges are found in each of the first five counts—do form a distinct and definite charge in each, against the several defendants, of an agreement between them to do an illegal act (e) ; and it therefore becomes unnecessary to consider the other additional objects and purposes alleged in some of these counts to have been comprised within the scope of the agreement of the several defendants.

The eighth count in the indictment charged a conspiracy to bring the tribunals of justice into contempt, and to cause the subjects to withdraw their differences from the said tribunals, and to submit the same to other tribunals. The ninth was similar to the eighth, but substituted for withdrawing their differences, &c., ‘ to assume and usurp the prerogative of the Crown in the establishment of courts for the administration of the law.’ The tenth count charged a conspiracy to bring into disrepute the tribunals for the administration of justice. And the eleventh count alleged that the defendants, intending by means of intimidation and demonstration of physical force, &c., by causing large numbers of persons to meet and assemble in Ireland, and by means of seditious and inflammatory speeches to be delivered to the said persons, and by means of publishing divers unlawful and seditious writings, to intimidate the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and thereby to effect changes in the laws and constitution, unlawfully and seditiously did conspire, &c., to cause large numbers of persons to meet together in divers places and at divers times in Ireland, and by means of seditious speeches to be made at the said places and times, and by means of publishing to the subjects of the Queen unlawful and seditious writings, &c., to intimidate the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and the Commons of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and thereby to effect and bring about changes and alterations in the laws and constitution. Tindal, C.J., in giving to the House of Lords the opinion of the consulted judges, said (f) : ‘ We all concur in opinion that the object and purpose of the agreement entered into by the defendants, as disclosed upon these counts, is an agreement for the performance of an act, and the attainment of an object, which is a violation of the laws of the land. We think it unnecessary to state reasons in support of the opinion that an agreement between the defendants to diminish the confidence of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland in the general administration of the law therein, or an agreement to bring into hatred and disrepute the tribunals by law established in Ireland for the administration of justice, are each and every of them agreements to effect purposes in manifest violation of the law. Upon the sufficiency of the eleventh count, no doubt whatever has been raised.'

Conspiracy to obtain money by getting from the lords of the treasury the appointment of a person to an office in the customs has been held a misdemeanor at common law. Counsel for the defendant proposed to argue that the indictment was bad on the face of it, as it was not a misdemeanor at common law to sell or to purchase an office like that of a coast waiter, and that, however reprehensible such a practice might be, it could only be made an indictable offence by Act of Parliament. But Ellenborough, C.J., said: 'If that be a question it must be debated on a motion in arrest of judgment, or on a writ of error. But after reading the case of R. v. Vaughan (g), it will be very difficult to argue that the offence charged in the indictment is not a misdemeanor.' And Grose, J., in passing sentence, likewise observed that there could be no doubt that the indictment was sufficient, and that the offence charged was clearly a misdemeanor at common law (h).

Nuisance.—It is said to be criminal to conspire to injure the public health as by selling unwholesome food. Many acts tending to the injury of the public health are nuisances at common law, or punishable summarily, or on indictment, and conspiracies to commit such offences would be criminal under the rule stated, ante, p. 150. The selling unwholesome provisions may be in some cases treated as a cheat or fraud at common law (i). In R. v. Mackarty (j), the indictment charged that the defendants, F. and M., falsely and deceitfully intending to defraud T. C., &c., together deceitfully bargained with him to barter, sell, and exchange a certain quantity of pretended wine, as good and true new Portugal wine, of him the said F., for certain goods of C.; and that, upon such bartering, &c., the said F. pretended to be a merchant, and to trade as such in Portugal wines, when, in fact, he was no such merchant, nor traded as such in wines; and the said M., on such bartering, &c., pretended to be a broker, when, in fact, he was not, and that the said C., giving credit to the said deceptions, did barter, sell, and exchange to F., and did deliver to M., as the broker between the said C. and F., for the use of F., goods, for the pretended new Portugal wine; and that M. and F., on such bartering, &c., affirmed that it was true new wine of Portugal, and was the wine of F., when, in fact, it was not Portugal wine, nor was it drinkable or wholesome, nor did it belong to F., to the great deceit and damage of the said C., and against the peace, &c. It is observed of this indictment, which was for a cheat at common law, that though it did not charge that the defendants conspired eo nomine, yet it charged that they together, &c., did the acts imputed to them, which might be considered to be tantamount (k). The case was considered as one of doubt and difficulty, but it seems that judgment was ultimately given for the Crown (l). In Treeve's case (m) it was ruled that an indictment lay for wilfully, maliciously, and deceitfully supplying to prisoners of war food unfit for human food. According to the statement of Alverstone, C.J., in R. v. Brailsford [1905], 1 K.B. 730-745, the ratio decidendi was not that stated in 1 East, P.C. 822, that to do as alleged lucri causa was indictable, but that the acts tended to produce a public mischief.

Conspiracies as to Paupers.—By the Poor Law Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), s. 8, it is a misdemeanor for any officer of any union, parish, or place to induce any person to contract a marriage by any threat or promise respecting any application to be made or order to be enforced with respect to the maintenance of a bastard child.

Conspiring and contriving, by sinister means, to marry a pauper of one parish to a settled inhabitant of another, in order to bring a charge upon it, has been held indictable (n). It is observed respecting a conspiracy of this kind, that, considering the offence is a prostitution of the sacred rites of marriage, for corrupt and mercenary purposes, and that, by artful and sinister means, persons are seduced into a connection for life without any inclination of their own, and contrary to that freedom of choice which is peculiarly required in forming so close an union, and on which the happiness of them both so entirely depends; and this for the sake of some gain or saving to others who bring about such marriage; in this light it seems a fit ground for criminal cognisance, not only as being a great oppression upon the parties themselves more immediately interested, but as an offence against society in general, being an abuse of that institution by which society is best continued and legal descents preserved, and a perversion of the purposes for which it was ordained (o). Upon an indictment against parish officers for a conspiracy of this kind, it appeared that a man of one parish having gotten with child a woman belonging to another parish, the defendants had agreed with the man (who was of the age of twenty-nine), with the approbation of his father, to give him two guineas if he would marry the woman, and that he afterwards married her on such condition, and received the money from the defendants immediately after the marriage; and it was also sworn, both by the man and the woman, that they were willing to marry at the time. Buller, J., directed an acquittal, notwithstanding the proof of the money having been given to procure such consent; and this after the putative father had been arrested under a justice's warrant, and was in custody of the overseers. He ruled that it was necessary, in support of such an indictment, to shew that the defendants had made use of some violence, threat, or contrivance, or used some sinister means to procure the marriage without the voluntary consent or inclination of the parties themselves; and said that R. v. Mackarty was a case of conspiracy as well as of false tokens.

(k) The indictment was for bartering pretended port wine alleged to be unwholesome. In R. v. Southerton, 6 East, 133, Ellenborough, C.J., said that the vending of such an article was clearly indictable, a deceit or public cheat, but the indictment was not framed for conspiracy. In R. v. Wheatly, 2 Burr. 1127, 1129, Denison, J.,

that the act of marriage, being in itself lawful, a conspiracy to procure it could only amount to a crime by the practice of some undue means (p).

Where the indictment stated the marriage to have been procured by threats and menaces against the peace, &c., it was held sufficient, without averring in terms that the marriage was against the will or consent of the parties, though that must be proved (q).

And an indictment does not lie for conspiracy merely to exonerate one parish from the charge of a pauper and to throw it on another, nor for conspiring to cause a male pauper to marry a female pauper for that purpose, it not being stated that the conspiracy was to effect such marriage by force, threats, or fraud, or that it was so effected in pursuance of the conspiracy (r). An allegation in such an indictment that a poor unmarried woman in a parish was with child is not equivalent to an allegation that she was chargeable to such parish (s). And it has been doubted whether an allegation that the defendants conspired together for the purpose of exonerating, is equivalent to allegation that they conspired to exonerate (t).

Upon an indictment for conspiring to give and giving a man money to marry a poor helpless woman, who was an inhabitant of B., in order to settle her in the parish of A., where the husband was settled, judgment was arrested, because it was not averred that she was last legally settled in B. (u). But it seems perfectly immaterial where the woman's settlement was, if it were not in A., provided that fact distinctly appeared (v). It was, however, usual to aver the settlements of the parties in their respective parishes, and also that the woman was chargeable to her own parish at the time, though this latter has never been adjudged to be necessary, nor seems to be required according to the general rules which govern the offence of conspiracy (w): for in such cases both the purpose and the means used are clearly unlawful.

Conspiring to let a pauper land to the intent that he may gain a settlement is illegal (x).

Acts Contra Bonos Mores.—Conspiracy to do acts regarded as contra bonos mores, is punishable by ecclesiastical law, but not criminal or tortious by common law or statute. In the seventeenth century the Court of King's Bench assumed jurisdiction to superintend offences contra bonos mores (y).

Conspiring to charge a man with being the father of a bastard child is indictable, whether the intent be to extort money or not. Where the object is stated to be to extort money, it is immaterial whether the woman is or is not pregnant (z), or whether the charge is or is not false (a), or that the child was likely to be chargeable (a). In a case where no intent to extort was alleged, the Court doubted upon the objection that the charge was not stated to be false, but ultimately held the indictment to be sufficient, as the defendants were at least charged with conspiring to accuse the prosecutor of fornication, and although that was a spiritual offence, conspiring to accuse of it was a temporal offence (a).

The same rule seems to have been applicable to conspiracies to charge with heresy, or any other spiritual defamation (a) or to charge another with slanderous matter (c). Combinations to subvert religion are said to be criminal (d).

It has been held criminal to conspire to prevent the burial of a corpse, or take up dead bodies for dissection (e). Digging up dead bodies without lawful authority is indictable at common law (f), and it is also contrary to ecclesiastical law and modern statutes (g).

In the following cases it has been held criminal at common law to conspire to debauch females under twenty-one. Lord Grey and others were charged, by an information at common law, with conspiring and intending the ruin of the Lady Henrietta Berkeley, then a virgin unmarried, within the age of eighteen years, one of the daughters of the Earl of Berkeley (she being under the custody, &c., of her father), and soliciting her to desert her father, and to commit whoredom and adultery with Lord Grey, who was the husband of another daughter of the Earl of Berkeley, sister of the Lady Henrietta, and to live and cohabit with him; and, further, the defendants were charged, that in prosecution of such conspiracy, they took away the Lady Henrietta at night from her father's house and custody, and against his will, and caused her to live and cohabit in divers secret places with Lord Grey, to the ruin of the lady and to the evil example, &c. The defendants were found guilty, though there was no proof of any force, but, on the contrary, it appeared that the lady, who was herself examined as a witness, was desirous of leaving her father's house, and concurred in all the measures taken for her departure and subsequent concealment. It was not shewn that any artifice was used to prevail on her to leave her father's house; but the case was put upon the ground that there was a solicitation and enticement of her to unlawful lust by Lord Grey, who was the principal person concerned, the others being his servants, or persons acting by his command, and under his control (h).

(h) R. v. Lord Grey, 9 St. Tr. 127; 1 East, P.C. 460. In Wright on Conspiracy, 26, 106, it is suggested that the offence charged was not conspiracy but abduction from her father's house and procurement of a girl of seventeen, and that this offence was punishable at common law. The word conspirantes is regarded by Mr. Wright as meaning 'contriving.'

combine, confederate, and agree together knowingly and designedly to procure, by false representations, false pretences, and other fraudulent means, J. C., a poor child, under the age of twenty-one years, to wit, of the age of fifteen years, to have illicit carnal connection with a man whose name was to the jurors unknown, and, upon a case reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that this count charged an indictable offence at common law (i).

A count alleged that the prisoners unlawfully conspired, &c., to solicit, persuade, and procure, and in pursuance of the said conspiracy did unlawfully solicit, incite, and endeavour to procure L. M., an unmarried girl, within the age of eighteen years, to become and be a common prostitute, and to commit whoredom and fornication for lucre and gain with men; and it was urged, in arrest of judgment, that the count was bad, as it did not aver that the girl was chaste; the fact of a loose woman committing fornication was not punishable by law; but it was held that the count was good, as it charged a conspiracy to bring about an illegal condition of things (j).

In R. v. Delaval (k), leave was given to exhibit a criminal information against a master, an attorney, and a gentleman to assign over a female apprentice by her own consent for purposes of prostitution.

In R. v. Robinson and Taylor (l), a woman was indicted for conspiring with a man that he should personate her master, and in that character should solemnise a marriage with her, for the purpose of afterwards raising a specious title to the property of the master, in pursuance of which conspiracy the parties intermarried. It was held that it was the province of the jury to collect, from all the circumstances of the case, whether there was not an intention to do a future injury to the person whose name was assumed, and that it was not necessary to prove any direct or immediate injury (l). Marriage under a false name is now a criminal offence (m).

In R. v. Serjeant (n) the defendant was held to have been properly convicted on an indictment, which charged that M. A. W. was a person of ill-fame and bad character, and a common prostitute, and that W. B. S. was an infant within the age of twenty-one years, and that M. A. W. and P. D. and S. J., intending to defraud the said W. B. S. of his property,

The indictment also contained two counts framed to charge an attempt to commit an offence under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 76 (rep. 1891, S. L. R.), but no opinion was expressed as to these counts. By ss. 4 & 5 (1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), having or attempting carnal knowledge of a girl under sixteen is criminal, and by s. 3 (2) it is criminal by false pretences or false representation to procure any woman or girl not being a common prostitute or of known immoral character to have any unlawful carnal connection.

conspired for the purpose aforesaid to procure a marriage to be solemnised between the said W. B. S. and the said M. A. W., by means of a false oath to be taken by the said M. A. W., and by divers false pretences, and without the consent of the mother of the said W. B. S., his father being dead, and that the said M. A. W. and P. D. and S. J., in pursuance of the said conspiracy, did prevail on the said W. B. S. to consent to marry the said M. A. W., and by means of such persuasion, and by means of a false oath taken by the said M. A. W., in order to obtain a licence for the solemnisation of marriage between the said W. B. S. and the said M. A. W., did cause the said W. B. S. to marry the said M. A. W., and a marriage by such licence was accordingly solemnised between them, without the leave of the mother of the said W. B. S., who then was such infant as aforesaid.

In Gibbon Wakefield's case (o), an indictment was held to lie for conspiring to carry away a woman under twenty-one from the custody of her parents and instructors, and afterwards to marry her to one of the offenders, contrary to the provisions of 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8, ss. 3 & 4 (rep.), and also for conspiring to commit the capital felony (under 3 Hen. VII. c. 2, s. 1 (rep.)) of taking away an heiress against her will, and afterwards marrying her to one of the defendants. The young lady, who was the heiress of a gentleman of large fortune, and was only fifteen years of age, was induced to leave the house where she had been placed, by means of a fictitious letter, fabricated by the defendants, who conveyed her to Gretna Green, where she was induced by means of false representations to go through the ceremony of a Scotch marriage, and to consent to become the wife of one of the defendants: and the defendants were convicted.

Public Justice.—All combinations to subvert public justice are now regarded as indictable. They fall into three classes:—

1. Conspiracies to make false accusations of crime or unfounded civil claims.
2. Conspiracies to threaten to make false accusations or claims.
3. Conspiracies to interfere with the fair trial of pending proceedings.

Conspiracies to make False Charges.—According to Sir R. S. Wright, conspiracy is a crime of statutory origin (p), and historically the oldest form of criminal conspiracy is that defined by the old statutes and ordinances, 28 Edw. I. c. 10 (q), and 33 Edw. I. But in O'Connell v. R. (r), Tindal, C.J., after saying that 'The crime of conspiracy is complete if two, or more than two, should agree to do an illegal thing; that is, to effect something in itself unlawful, or to effect, by unlawful means,

(o) R. v. Wakefield, 2 Lew. 1. The marriage being in Scotland, an indictment for felony under 3 Hen. VII. c. 2, s. 1, could not have been supported, and there was no evidence to support an indictment under 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8, s. 4. An indictment was preferred upon 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8, s. 3, but no judgment given upon it. See Murray's report of the case.

(p) It is said that a false indictment is no crime as referred to the individual, but that a conspiracy to prefer one subjected the offenders to the villainous judgment. 1 Edw. III. st. 2, c. 11; 2 Co. Inst. 384. This judgment does not seem to have been pronounced since the time of Edw. III. R. v. Spragg, 2 Burr. 996, 997.

(q) This statute seems to give only civil remedies.

(r) 13 Cl. & F. 155, citing R. v. Best, 2 Ld. Raym. 167, and R. v. Edwards, 8 Mod. 320.

something which in itself may be indifferent, or even lawful,' adds 'that it was an offence known to the common law, and not first created by the 33 Edw. I. stat. 2 (s), is manifest. That statute speaks of conspiracy as a term at that time well known to the law, and professes only to be "a definition of conspirators." It has accordingly always been held to be the law, that the gist of the offence of conspiracy is the bare engagement and association to break the law, whether any act be done in pursuance thereof by the conspirators or not.'

The description of conspirators in the ordinacio de conspiratoribus (33 Edw. I.) (t), is that 'conspirators be they that do confeder or bind themselves by oath, covenant, or other alliance, that every of them shall aid and bear the other falsely and maliciously to indict, or cause to indict, or falsely to move and maintain pleas; and also such as cause children within age to appeal men of felony, whereby they are imprisoned and sore grieved (s): and such as retain men in the country with liveries or fees for to maintain their malicious enterprises, and to drown the truth; and this extendeth as well to the takers, as to the givers; and stewards and bailiffs of great lords, who by their seigniorie, office, or power, undertake to bear or maintain quarrels, pleas, or debates, that concern other parties than such as touch the estate of their lords or themselves' (u). The ordinance is repealed as to combinations with respect to wages (v), and the definition contained in it is, of course, not exhaustive of the varieties of conspiracy (w).

One of the oldest definitions of conspiracy is 'a consultation and agreement between two or more to appeal, or indict an innocent person falsely and maliciously of felony, whom accordingly they cause to be indicted or appealed; and afterwards the party is lawfully acquitted by the verdict of twelve men' (x).

From the statutory definition it seems clearly to follow that not only those who actually cause an innocent man to be indicted, and also to be tried upon the indictment, whereupon he is lawfully acquitted, are properly conspirators, but that those also are guilty of this offence, who barely conspire to indict a man falsely and maliciously, whether they do any act in prosecution of such conspiracy or not; for the words of the statute seem expressly to include all such confederacies under the notion of conspiracy, whether there be any prosecution or not (y).

It appears not only from the words of the statute but also from the plain reason of the thing, that no confederacy whatsoever to maintain a (t) Sometimes cited as 21 Edw. I.

(u) The latter part of the ordinance deals with maintenance (q. v. post, p. 587). In some old books confederacy is applied to agreements to maintain, and conspiracy to agreements to indict. See Wright on Conspiracy, 18.

(y) 1 Hawk. c. 72, s. 2. In R. v. Spragg, 2 Burr. 993, 998, Serjeant Davy said: 'There is a distinction between a writ of conspiracy and an indictment for conspiracy. In an action the damage is the gist of the action; and therefore the writ and declaration must charge "that he was indicted and sustained damage"; but that is not necessary in an indictment, which is for an offence against the public. And this distinction explains Lord Coke's meaning in 3 Inst. 143.'

suit can come within the words of the 33 Edw. I. stat. 2, unless it is both false and malicious (z).

By the conjoint effect of the ordinance and the common law (a), it is criminal unlawfully to agree to injure any person by a false charge, whether the offence charged is a temporal or an ecclesiastical offence (b), and whether it is treason felony or misdemeanor, or merely a charge affecting his credit or reputation.

This form of conspiracy is not criminal if the charge was to be preferred honestly and with reasonable belief in its truth (c). Several persons may lawfully meet together and consult to prosecute a guilty person, or one against whom there is probable cause of suspicion; but not to prosecute one who is innocent, right or wrong (d). And associations to prosecute felons, and even to put the laws in force against political offenders, are lawful (e).

It seems not to be any justification of a conspiracy to carry on a false and malicious prosecution, that the indictment which was preferred, or intended to be preferred in pursuance of it, was insufficient, or that the Court wherein the prosecution was carried on or designed to be carried on had no jurisdiction of the cause, or that the matter of the indictment did import no manner of scandal, so that the party grieved was, in truth, in no danger of losing either his life, liberty, or reputation. For notwithstanding the injury intended to the party against whom such a conspiracy is formed may perhaps be inconsiderable, yet the association to pervert the law, in order to procure it, is criminal (f). On an indictment for wickedly and unlawfully conspiring to accuse another of taking hair out of a bag, without alleging it to be an unlawful and felonious taking, it was said by Lord Mansfield that the gist of the offence was the unlawful conspiracy to do an injury to another by a false charge, and that whether the conspiracy were to charge a man with criminal acts or such only as may affect his reputation, it was sufficient (g).

It is immaterial whether the conspirators proceed to indict the object of the conspiracy or whether they stop short at the formation of the conspiracy or at any point short of the actual indictment and trial. Where the indictment has been preferred and tried it is not essential to prove acquittal (h) to found an indictment for conspiracy to prefer the charge.

In R. v. M'Daniel, the defendants were charged with a conspiracy, in causing a man to be executed for a robbery, of which they knew he was innocent, with intent to get into their possession the reward offered by Act of Parliament (i). And it would have been equally a conspiracy, though the defendants had failed in their infamous design, and the man had been acquitted.

2. A conspiracy to indict for the purpose of extorting money is criminal whether the charge is true or false (j), and so is a conspiracy to enforce by legal process the payment of money known by the conspirators not to be due (k). A conspiracy to threaten prosecution or exposure, or injury, with a view to extort are clearly criminal, because such threats by an individual are criminal (l), either absolutely or when made without reasonable and probable cause for the demand made (m).

In the case of a conspiracy to extort, it is immaterial whether the charge or imputation threatened to be made is true or false (n).

Where the plaintiff had been arrested at the suit of C., and B. had become bail for her, and some proceedings had been taken against him as bail, and B., C., and others went to the plaintiff's lodgings, and B. said he must have his money or the plaintiff must go to gaol, and stated that two others were officers, which was not the fact; and the plaintiff being frightened, delivered to B. a watch and other articles, and two of the others wrote two papers, which were signed by the plaintiff and B., and which papers stated that the articles were deposited with B. as a security; Lyndhurst, C.B., held that, as the defendants all acted in concert, they were guilty of a conspiracy, for which they might all have been indicted (o).

3. Conspiracies to interfere with the fair trial of proceedings, civil or criminal, are indictable (p). The interference itself is in many, if not in all cases summarily punishable as contempt of court (q), if the proceedings are pending in a superior court of record, and is indictable in whatever court the proceedings are pending (r).

The following conspiracies have been held criminal :—

To interfere with the course of Justice, or to pervert the minds of magistrates or jurors, by publishing, pending criminal proceedings, matter calculated to prejudice a fair trial, e.g., by publishing in newspapers assertions of the guilt or imputations against the character of a prisoner awaiting trial (s).

To dissuade or prevent witnesses from giving evidence (t), or to prevent a witness from attending the trial (u), or to prepare witnesses to suppress truth (v). To bribe or tamper with jurors (w), or to corrupt judges (x). Deceit and collusion in Courts of Justice by submitting fabricated evidence or otherwise (y). As to conspiring to indemnify bail, see R. v. Stockwell, 66 J.P. 376.

Secreting Witness.—A count alleged that S., J., and B. had been committed for trial for obtaining money by false pretences from H., and that H. agreed with W. and P. and the wife of B., intending to defeat the due course of law, that H. should not attend to prosecute or give evidence, and should receive, in consideration thereof, 400*l.* from the said wife of B., and then alleged that H. did receive the 400*l.* The three following counts alleged the object to be to defeat and obstruct the due course of law. The averments were proved. For the defendants it was alleged that B. had such influence over H. that the latter had made an affidavit exculpating B. from any participation in the fraud, and that he was thus placed in the dilemma that, if he did not prosecute, he forfeited his recognisances, and, if he did prosecute, he might be indicted for perjury; and that P., who was his guardian, in order to extricate his ward from this position, had been a party to the compromise, but without any intention to do wrong, or to obstruct the course of justice. But Campbell, C.J., held that, if the necessary effect of the agreement was to defeat the ends of justice, that must be taken to be the object; and the jury were directed to say, on the first and second counts, whether the defendants did not agree not to prosecute as therein alleged; and on the third and fourth counts whether they conspired to obstruct and defeat the ends of justice. If they did so agree and conspire, whatever might be their private reasons, it was the duty of the jury to convict the defendants (z).

Fabricating Evidence.—In R. v. Mawbey (a), it was held that a certificate by justices of the peace that an indicted highway is in repair, is a legal instrument, recognised by the courts of law, and admissible in evidence after conviction, when the Court is about to impose a fine; and that, consequently, it was illegal to conspire to pervert the course of justice by producing a false certificate in evidence to influence the judgment of the Court. The indictment stated that a highway was indicted as being out of repair, and a plea of not guilty, but that it was intended to apply to withdraw the plea and plead guilty; that two justices of the county, and two other persons, conspired to pervert the course of justice

The first count had only the word 'agree' and not conspire, and on its being said that this count did not charge a conspiracy, Lord Campbell said, 'Nothing turns on that. Conspire is nothing: agreement is the thing.'

and impose on the Court by producing a false certificate from the two defendants, who were justices, that the road was in repair, and that they did so. There was a verdict against the two justices, and a rule was obtained to arrest the judgment, but after full argument was discharged. Ashhurst, J., said: 'The principal question is whether a conspiracy to pervert the course of justice by producing in evidence a false certificate be or be not a crime? It seems to me a greater offence can hardly be stated than that of obstructing or perverting the course of justice, on which the lives and properties of all the subjects depend.' Grose, J., said: 'It is laid down in some of the cases that an attempt to persuade another not to give evidence in a Court of justice is indictable; then it cannot be doubted but that an attempt to mislead the Court by misrepresentation is equally criminal. The course of justice is perverted if the certificate of the justices be false. If they agree to certify that a road is in repair for the purpose of perverting the course of justice it is a crime and indictable; and it is not necessary that they should know at the time of such agreement that the road is out of repair; it is sufficient that they did not know that the fact which they certified to be true was true.' Lawrence, J., said: 'The question is, whether a conspiracy to do an act from which the public may receive any damage be or be not indictable? At first I thought this a very doubtful case, because it struck me that this was an act by which the public would not suffer, as the Court of the Assizes were not bound to receive the certificate of the defendants, it not being on oath. But on examination it appears that the practice of receiving the certificates of magistrates respecting the state of roads, has existed as far as the memory of living persons extends, and the books carry it still further back. I have not been able to discover how or when the practice of receiving these certificates arose; but a practice that has been adopted in the Courts at least as long back as the reign of Charles the First, goes a great way to show what the law is upon the subject. And this is not the only instance of receiving certificates in evidence; certificates of bishops with respect to marriages are received; the customs of London are certified by the recorder; so formerly were certificates received from the captain of Calais; and in Cro. Eliz. 502, this court said that they would give credit to the certificates of the judges in Wales respecting the practice of their Court, and that the custom of the Court is a law in that Court.'

Where one brother had executed a conveyance of land to another for the avowed object of giving the latter a colourable qualification to kill game, and to get rid of an information then pending against him, it seems to have been considered as quite clear that they were both guilty of conspiracy (b).

Conspiracy to Cheat and Defraud.—It is said that private deceits coupled with conspiracy are indictable (c), and it is clearly criminal to conspire to commit public frauds in trade (d) or public cheats (e), whether the fraud or cheat, if done by an individual without conspiracy would give only a ground for civil remedies at law or in equity, or would be criminally punishable. Conspiracies to obtain property by false pretences may be treated as conspiracies to commit a crime punishable by law (f). But it is usual also to charge the conspiracy as one to cheat by subtle means and devices (g). And it is under the head of conspiracy that many forms of swindling are reached by the criminal law.

Sales.—Thus it is criminal to conspire to defraud another in the sale of goods or chattels. Thus where the defendants conspired to make a false representation that horses were the property of a private person and not of a horse-dealer, and were quiet to ride and drive, and thereby induced a gentleman to buy them at a large price, they were held to have been rightly convicted on a count which charged them with conspiring by false pretences and subtle means to cheat the gentleman of his money (h).

An indictment against B. and C. for conspiracy alleged that one S. sold to B. a mare for £39, and that the prisoners, whilst the said sum was unpaid, conspired by false and fraudulent representations that the said mare was unsound of her wind, and that she had been examined by a veterinary surgeon, who had pronounced her a roarer, and that B. had sold her for £27 to induce S. to receive a much less sum in payment for the said mare than B. had agreed to pay S. for the same, and thereby to cheat S. of a large part of the said sum agreed to be paid for the said mare. The mare had been sold by S. to B. for the price as alleged on credit. The prisoners afterwards conspired to send a false account of the mare to S., and thereby to get him to forgo part of the agreed price; and sent a letter to S. stating that the mare was unsound and had been examined by a veterinary surgeon, and he had pronounced her a roarer. In consequence of this letter S. saw C., who stated that he had examined the mare and that she was unsound, which he knew to be false. S. afterwards saw B., who told him that he had sold the mare for £27 only (which was false), and persuaded him to receive that sum in satisfaction of his claim, but no receipt or other discharge was given. Upon a case reserved, it was held that the indictment was sustainable, and that the facts given in evidence did sustain it. The substance of the charge was that the prisoners conspired to use unlawful means, namely, false representations, to induce the prosecutor to forgo a part of his claim; and there was no force in the argument that, because the prisoners did not by means of their false representations alter the right of the prosecutor to his full claim, the indictment is not sustainable; since in no case where a change is made in the possession of a chattel through a fraud is the property altered. It was not necessary that the fraud should be successful. The offence charged and proved came within the legal definition of a conspiracy (i).

Games.—A count alleged that the prisoners unlawfully did conspire by divers unlawful and fraudulent devices and contrivances, and by divers false pretences, unlawfully to win from R. the sum of £2 10s. of his money, and unlawfully to cheat him of the same. The prisoners and R. were in a public-house, and in concert with the other two prisoners, D. placed a pen-case on the table, and left the room to get writing-paper. Whilst he was absent the other prisoners, H. and S., were alone with R., and H. took up the pen-case, and took the pen from it, placing a pin in the place of it, and put the pen he had taken out under the bottom of R.'s drinking glass, and H. then proposed to R. to bet D., when he returned, that there was no pen in the pen-case. R. was induced by H. and S. to stake fifty shillings in a bet with D. that there was no pen in the pen-case, which money R. placed on the table, and H. snatched up to hold. The pen-case was then turned up into R.'s hand, and another pen with the pin fell into his hand, and then the prisoners took his money. It was contended, on a case reserved, that this was a mere deceit not concerning the public, and that there was no false pretence on which any of the prisoners could have been convicted of obtaining money by false pretences. The prosecutor intended to cheat D., and was a party to the fraud, and could not maintain this indictment. Pollock, C.B., said, 'We are all of opinion that the conviction is good. The expression "by false pretences" used in the count is not to be construed in the technical sense contended for by the counsel for the prisoners. We think that there was abundant evidence of a conspiracy to cheat. Though it be an ingredient in that conspiracy to induce the man who is cheated to think that he is cheating some one else, that does not prevent those who use that device from being amenable to punishment' (j).

False Accounts, &c.—Where an indictment alleged that a joint stock company had been established, the capital of which was to consist of 2,000 shares, and charged the defendants with conspiring to fabricate a great number of other shares in addition to the said 2,000, and it appeared that the company had not been legally established, Abbott, C.J., was of opinion that if, in point of fact, a combination to the effect stated in the indictment were made out, such conduct, in point of law, constituted a criminal conspiracy, notwithstanding the original imperfection of the company's formation (k). If bankers combine to deceive and defraud their shareholders by publishing false balance sheets, they are indictable for a conspiracy (l).

An indictment against the manager and secretary of a joint stock bank, contained many counts, some charging that the defendants concurred in making and publishing false statements of the affairs of the bank, and others that they conspired together to do so. The prosecutors were put to elect on which set of counts they would rely, and they having elected to rely on the counts for conspiracy, it was held, that it was not enough to prove that the defendants made and put forth false statements intended and calculated to deceive, unless they had entered into a precedent and fraudulent conspiracy to do so. The chief count relied upon not stating an intent to defraud any particular parties; it was held, that though there were auditors, whose duty it would be to discover any frauds, that was no answer to the prosecution, if the defendants were party to such conspiracy to deceive them and the directors. But, on the other hand, the jury were told that evidence that the directors were privy to all that was done was very material, with a view to negative such conspiracy, on the part of the defendants, to deceive (m).

An indictment charged that the defendants H., B., and M., fraudulently and unlawfully conspired that B. should write his acceptance to a certain paper-writing, purporting to be a bill of exchange, &c., for £30 (the tenor of which was set out), in order that H. might, by such acceptance, and by the name M. being indorsed on the back thereof, negotiate the said paper-writing as a good bill of exchange, truly drawn at Bath, by one J. C., for S. and Co., as partners in the business of bankers, under the style of Bath Bank, as persons well known to them the said defendants, and thereby fraudulently to obtain from the King's subjects goods and monies; that B., in pursuance of such conspiracy and agreement, did fraudulently and unlawfully write his acceptance to the said paper-writing, well knowing the firm of S. & Co. to be fictitious; that the defendants procured the indorsement 'B. M.' to be written on the same, and that the said H., in pursuance of such fraudulent conspiracy, did utter the said paper-writing to one S. R., as and for a good bill of exchange, truly drawn, &c., and accepted by the said B. as a person able to pay the said sum of £30, in order to negotiate the same, and by means thereof did fraudulently obtain a gold watch, value eighteen guineas, and £11 2s. in money; whereas, in truth, at the time of drawing, accepting, and uttering the said bill, there were no such persons as S. & Co. in the business of bankers at Bath, and the said B. was not of sufficient ability to pay the said £30, they, the defendants, well knowing the same, &c., whereby they defrauded the said S. R. of the said goods and monies. The facts so charged being fully proved, the defendants were convicted (n).

It has been held criminal to conspire to cause the conspirators or others to be believed persons of large property for the purpose of defrauding tradesmen (o): and to conspire to enable a person to get goods on credit by means of a false character, knowing that he did not intend to pay for them (p).

Knock outs.—In Levi v. Levi (q), an action for slander, it appeared that certain brokers were in the habit of agreeing together to attend sales by auction, and that one of them only should bid for any particular article, and that after the sale they should have a meeting consisting of themselves only, at another place, to put up to sale among themselves, at a fair price, the goods that each had bought at the auction, and that the difference between the price at which the goods were bought at the auction, and the fair price at this private resale, should be shared among them; Gurney, B., was of opinion that, as owners of goods had a right to expect at an auction that there would be an open competition from the public, if a knot of men went to an auction upon an agreement among themselves of the kind that had been described, they were guilty of an indictable offence, and might be tried for a conspiracy. But this ruling has in a later case of higher authority been declared to be a mere nisi prius dictum (r).

Mock Auctions.—A mock auction, with sham bidders, who pretend to be real bidders, for the purpose of selling goods at prices grossly above their worth, is an offence at common law; and persons aiding or abetting such a proceeding may be indicted for a conspiracy with intent to defraud (s).

Bankruptcy.—It is criminal to conspire to defeat creditors by disposing of goods in contemplation of bankruptcy (t); and to conspire to conceal and embezzle the personal estate of a bankrupt (u); or within four months before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition to fraudulently remove the debtor's property to the value of £10 (v), and this last form of conspiracy is criminal if the agreement to remove the goods was made in contemplation of bankruptcy, even if in the result no adjudication was obtained (w).

Partnership Matters.—It has been held criminal to conspire to cheat by false representations as to the amount of profits of a business carried on by one of the defendants, whereby they induced a third person to enter into partnership with one of them (x). On the dissolution of a partnership between the prisoner and L., the prisoner agreed with W. and P. to forge documents, and to make false entries in the books and accounts of a partnership, so as to make it appear that debts existed and were owing which did not exist, so as to reduce the amount divisible between the partners, with intent to cheat and defraud L. Held, that the prisoner was rightly convicted of conspiring with W. and P. to defraud L. (y).

Stocks and Shares.—The defendants were indicted, as directors and

The Debtors Act, 1869, and the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 and 1890, are not so limited. In R. v. Jones it was laid down that the indictment must set out the petitioning creditor's debt, the trading, and the act of bankruptcy. This seems now to be needless. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 19.

This case is reported mainly as to the form of indictment. In such an indictment it is expedient and perhaps essential to state that the conspiracy was formed in contemplation of bankruptcy. See Myerson v. R., 5 Australian C. L. R. 597, where Heymann v. R. is discussed.

promoters of a limited company, for conspiring to induce the committee of the Stock Exchange to order a quotation of the shares of the company in their official list, and thereby to induce and persuade divers subjects of the Queen, who should thereafter buy and sell the shares of the said company, to believe that the said company was duly formed and constituted, and had in all respects complied with the rules and regulations of the . . . Stock Exchange, so as to entitle the said company to have their shares quoted in the official list of the said Stock Exchange. Held, that the indictment disclosed an indictable offence, since there was an agreement to cheat and defraud by means of false pretences those subjects who might buy shares in the company (z). But in Ireland an indictment charging a conspiracy 'by false pretences to defraud all such persons as should apply' to the prisoners for a loan of money, was held bad (a).

It is criminal to conspire on a particular day by false rumours to raise the price of the public government funds, with intent to injure the subjects who should purchase on that day, and that the indictment was well enough without specifying the particular persons who purchased as the persons intended to be injured, and that the public government funds of this kingdom might mean either British or Irish funds, which since the Union were each a part of the United Kingdom. After argument in arrest of judgment, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., said: 'I am perfectly clear that there is not any ground for the motion in arrest of judgment. A public mischief is stated as the object of this conspiracy; the conspiracy is by false rumours to raise the price of the public funds and securities, and the crime lies in the act of conspiracy and combination to effect that purpose, and would have been complete, although it had not been pursued to its consequences, or the parties had not been able to carry it into effect. The purpose itself is mischievous; it strikes at the price of a vendible commodity in the market, and if it gives a fictitious price by means of false rumours, it is a fraud levelled against all the public, for it is against all such as may possibly have anything to do with the funds on that particular day.' Bayley, J., said: 'It is not necessary to constitute this an offence that it should be prejudicial to the public in its aggregate capacity, or to all the King's subjects, but it is enough if it be prejudicial to a class of the subjects. Here then is a conspiracy to effect an illegal end, and not only so, but to effect it by illegal means, because to raise the funds by false rumours is by illegal means. And the end is illegal, for it is to create a temporary rise in the funds without any foundation, the necessary consequence of which must be to prejudice all those who become purchasers during the period of that fluctuation.' Dampier, J.: 'I own I cannot raise a doubt, but that this is a complete crime of conspiracy according to any definition of it. The means used are wrong, they were false rumours; the object is wrong, it was to give a false value to a commodity in the public market, which was injurious to those who had to purchase' (b).

It seems also to be criminal to raise the price of a commodity by fictitious sales (c). And it has been held criminal to conspire to deal fraudulently in railway tickets (d).

Conspiracy to do Acts not wrongful if done by one Person.—In many cases an agreement to do a certain thing has been considered as the subject of an indictment for conspiracy at common law, though the same act, if done separately by each individual without any agreement amongst themselves, would not have been criminal or even actionable (e).

The application of this theory has caused much difficulty and controversy, especially as to combinations with reference to trade, or of employers against workmen or workmen against employers (f); and the rule has been altered by statute with respect to certain acts done legitimately and not maliciously in furtherance of trade disputes (g).

This theory has been applied to an agreement between several to maintain each other right or wrong (h), and to a combination between military officers of the East India Company to resign their commissions in order to intimidate the Company into granting certain allowances (i).

It has been said with respect to premeditated and systematic tumults at a theatre, that 'the audience have certainly a right to express by applause or hisses the sensations which naturally present themselves at the moment; and nobody has ever hindered, or would ever question, the exercise of that right. But if any body of men were to go to the theatre with the settled intention of hissing an actor or even of damning a piece, there can be no doubt that such a deliberate and preconcerted scheme would amount to a conspiracy, and that the persons concerned in it might be brought to punishment' (j).

The accepted authority with respect to this branch of the law of conspiracy is the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (k), approved and adopted in the H. L., on appeal (l)

It would seem that the acts of the defendants were criminal independently of conspiracy. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, s. 1, post, Bk. xi. c. ix., specially refers to and keeps alive 'the offence of spreading or conspiring to spread any false rumour with intent to enhance or deery the price of any goods or merchandise.'

(c) R. v. Hilbers, 2 Chit. (K.B.) 163. This was a motion for a criminal information for a conspiracy to raise the price of oil by making fictitious sales, and the Court held that it must appear that two combined together, as it was no offence for an individual separately to endeavour.

In an unreported case, K.B. 18 or 19 Geo. III., Lord Mansfield is said to have ruled that where several conspired to hiss at the Birmingham theatre it was indictable, though each might have hissed separately. This seems to be *R. v. In this case an associated body of traders endeavoured to get the whole of a limited trade into their own hands by offering exceptional and very favourable terms to customers who would deal exclusively with them,—terms so favourable that but for the object of keeping the trade to themselves they would not have given such terms, but with the intention not of injuring their rivals, but of preventing rival traders from competing with them. The combination was held not to be an indictable conspiracy.

and in subsequent cases (m). He said, 'Of the general proposition that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in any one individual may become criminal if done by combination among several, there can be no doubt. The distinction is based on sound reason, for a combination may make oppressive or dangerous that which if it proceeded only from a single person would be otherwise, and the very fact of the combination may shew that the object is simply to do harm and not to exercise one's own just rights (n). In the application of this undoubted principle it is necessary to be very careful not to press the doctrine of illegal conspiracy beyond that which is necessary for the protection of individuals or of the public (o). . . . But what is the definition of an illegal combination? It is an agreement by one or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means; O'Connell v. R. (p), R. v. Parnell (q), and the question to be solved is whether there has been any such agreement here. Have the defendants combined to do an unlawful act? Have they combined to do a lawful act by unlawful means? . . . The truth is that the combination of capital for purposes of trade and competition is a very different thing from such a combination of several persons against one with a view to harm him as falls under the head of an indictable conspiracy. There is no just cause or excuse in the latter class of cases. There is such a just cause or excuse in the former. There are cases in which the very fact of a combination is evidence of a design to do that which is hurtful without just cause,—is evidence (to use a technical expression) of malice. But it is perfectly legitimate, as it seems to me, to combine capital for all the mere purposes of trade for which capital may, apart from combination, be legitimately used in trade. . . . Would it be an indictable conspiracy to agree to drink up all the water from a common spring in a time of drought; to buy up by preconcerted action all the provisions in a market or district in times of scarcity (see R. v. Waddington) (r); to combine to purchase all the shares of a company against a coming settling day, or to agree to give away articles of trade gratis in order to withdraw custom from a trade? May two itinerant match-vendors combine to sell matches below their value in order by competition to drive a third match-vendor from the street? . . . The question must be decided by the application of the test I have indicated. Assume that what is done is intentional and that it is calculated to do harm to others. Then comes the question, Was it done without just cause

Moreover, laws adapted to individuals not acting in concert with others require modification and extension if they are to be applied with effect to large bodies of persons acting in concert. law of conspiracy is based on this undeniable truth.'

or excuse? If it was bona fide done in the use of a man's own property, in the exercise of a man's own trade, such legal justification would, I think, exist not the less because what was done might seem to others to be selfish or unreasonable (see R. v. Rowlands, 17 Q.B. 671). But such legal justification would not exist when the act was merely done with the intention of causing temporal harm without reference to one's own lawful gain or the lawful enjoyment of one's own rights. The good sense of the tribunal which had to decide would have to analyse the circumstances, and to discover on which side of the line each case fell. But if the real object were to enjoy what was one's own, or to acquire for one's self some advantage in one's property or trade, and what was done was done honestly, peaceably, and without any of the illegal acts before referred to, it could not in my opinion properly be said that it was done without just cause or excuse. One may with advantage borrow for the benefit of traders what was said by Erle, J., in R. v. Rowlands, 17 Q.B. 671, 687, of workmen and of masters. "The intention of the law is at present to allow either of them to follow the dictates of their own will with respect to their own actions and their own property, and either, I believe, has a right to study to promote his own advantage or to combine with others to promote their mutual advantage."'

It has been held criminal for two or more to combine to make for sale pirated copies of copyright music in order to obtain profits out of that music to which the conspirators are not entitled. Such a combination has been regarded as a conspiracy for the unlawful purpose of depriving the owner of his property or civil rights (s).

'A combination to violate without just cause' (t) 'private rights, contractual or other, in which the public has a sufficient interest, is a criminal conspiracy if the violation of the private right is an actionable wrong' (u). 'It is not necessary, in order to constitute a conspiracy, that the acts agreed to be done should be acts which if done would be criminal. It is enough that the acts agreed to be done, although not criminal, are wrongful, i.e., amount to a civil wrong' (v). An agreement by members of either House of Parliament to deceive the House by making false defamatory statements in Parliament has been held not to be indictable (w).

A combination without justification (x) to insult, annoy (y), injure, or impoverish (z) another person is a criminal conspiracy.

the farmers of excise, because the information shewed that the excise was parcel of the revenue of the crown, and so the impoverishment of the farmers of excise tended to prejudice the revenue of the crown. This case is treated in R. v. Daniell (b), as one to do an act of a public nature.

In R. v. Eccles (c), several persons were convicted on an indictment which charged them with conspiring to impoverish one H. B., a tailor, and to prevent him, by indirect means, from carrying on his trade. This, however, appears to have been considered as a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and so far a conspiracy to do an unlawful act affecting the public (d). So far as this case depends on the theory of restraint of trade, it seems now of little authority (e).

An indictment cannot be supported for a conspiracy to deprive a man of the office of secretary to an illegal unincorporated trading company. Ellenborough, C.J., said that the society being certainly illegal, to deprive an individual of an office in it could not be treated as an injury: and that when the prosecutor was secretary to the society, instead of having an interest which the law would protect, he was guilty of a crime (f).

In R. v. Parnell (g), it was held to be criminal to combine to solicit tenants of land in Ireland to refuse to pay rent, and to prevent tenants from paying their lawful rent by threatening them with boycotting or social excommunication. This ruling was approved in Quinn v. Leathem (h).

Trespass to Land.—In R. v. Turner (i), it was ruled that an indictment would not lie for conspiring to commit a civil trespass to land, by agreeing to go, and by going into, a preserve for hares, the property of another, for the purpose of snaring them, though it was alleged to be done in the night-time, and that the defendants were armed with offensive weapons, for the purpose of opposing resistance to any endeavours to apprehend or obstruct them (j). Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in pronouncing the judgment of the Court, said: ‘I should be sorry that the cases in conspiracy against individuals, which have gone far enough, should be pushed still farther. I should be sorry to have it doubted whether persons agreeing to go and sport upon another’s ground, in other words, to commit a civil trespass, should be thereby in peril of an indictment for an offence which would subject them to infamous punishment’ (ii). It may be observed that it was not stated in the indictment that the weapons were

IV. c. 69, and it is conceived that a conspiracy to commit an offence within that statute would be indictable, although not carried into effect. See R. v. Wakefield, ante, p. 160. dangerous, nor that the defendants conspired to go, &c., with strong hand. But in R. v. Rowlands (j), Campbell, C.J., said of R. v. Turner: 'I have no doubt whatever that it was wrongly decided. Going into the prosecutor's close against his will, armed with offensive weapons for the purpose of opposing any persons who should endeavour to apprehend, obstruct, or prevent them, would in itself be an indictable offence; and conspiring to commit such an offence must be an indictable conspiracy.'

In R. v. Druitt (jj), the indictment was for a conspiracy by unlawful ways, contrivances, and stratagems to impoverish P. and others in their trade and business, and to restrain their freedom of trade and of personal action. The defendants were members of a tailors' trade union, and during a strike instigated by the union picketed the doors of employers to note work-people who went in and out, in order to deter them from continuing to work and to induce them to join the union. This conduct was ruled to be intimidation and molestation and obstruction within the statutes then restricting the combination of workmen (6 Geo. IV. c. 129, s. 3, and 22 Vict. c. 34, s. 1). Bramwell, B., ruled that it was not an offence to picket if the picketing were done in a way to excite no reasonable alarm, and not to coerce or annoy those who were subject to it, and that peaceful persuasion without coercion or intimidation was lawful (k). He also said that the right to personal liberty which the law protected included liberty of the mind and will as well as of the body (l), and that 'if any set of men agreed among themselves to coerce that liberty of mind and thought by compulsion and restraint they would be guilty of a criminal offence, namely, that of conspiring against the liberty of mind and freedom of will of those towards whom they so conducted themselves. He was referring to coercion or compulsion—something that was unpleasant and annoying to the mind operated upon—and he laid it down as clear and undoubted law that if two or more persons agreed that they would by any such means co-operate together against that liberty they would be guilty of an indictable offence.' This ruling was discussed and questioned by Coleridge, C.J., in Gibson v. Lawson (m), and the Mogul case (n): but in the latter case (o) Lord Halsbury said: 'I am unable to concur with the Lord Chief Justice's criticism, if its meaning was rightly interpreted, which I very much doubt, on the observations made by my noble and learned friend Lord Bramwell in R. v. Druitt, if that was intended to treat as doubtful the proposition that a combination to insult and annoy a person would be an indictable conspiracy. I should have thought it beyond all doubt or question that such a combination would be an indictable misdemeanor.'

In R. v. Bunn (p), Brett, J., ruled that an indictment would lie at common law for conspiring to commit an offence which under statute was summarily punishable. The indictment was for conspiracy by gas stokers to force their employers to conduct their business contrary to their own will by improper threats or improper molestation, by forcing the employers against their will to employ a man whom they objected to employ, and alleged that they endeavoured to obtain the object of their combination by simultaneously breaking their contracts of service. The result of this combination was to create a great public mischief by leaving London unlit. Other rulings in the case led to the repeal of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 32, and the enacting of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86 (g).

Conspiracies with Reference to Trade Disputes.—Prior to 1871, it had often been held criminal to conspire under certain circumstances—for workmen to combine to raise the rate of wages (r); or to injure or obstruct employers (s); or to induce workmen to leave their employment (t); or to procure their discharge (u); or to strike (v); or to picket the works of the employers (w).

Many cases in the books relate to such conspiracies. Certain of these cases relate to conspiracies in breach of statutes relating to combination by workmen. The earlier Acts were repealed in 1824, and replaced by 5 Geo. IV. c. 95, itself repealed in 1826, and replaced by 6 Geo. IV. c. 129. That Act and subsequent amending Acts were repealed in 1871 (x) and replaced by the Trade Union Acts, 1871 (y), and 1876 (z), and by the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (a), and the Trade Disputes Act, 1906 (b). The portions of these Acts relating to the constitution, registration, and internal government of trade unions are not relevant to the purposes of this treatise (c). By sect. 16 of the Act of 1876 (d): The term “trade union” means any combination, whether temporary or permanent, for regulating the relations between workmen and masters, or between workmen and workmen, or between masters and masters, or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business, whether such combination would or would not, if the principal Act (of 1871) had not been passed, have been deemed to have been an unlawful combination by reason of some one or more of its purposes being in restraint of trade.' By sect. 5 (2) of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. c. 47), this definition is extended so as to 'include any combination as therein defined, notwithstanding that such combination may be the branch of a trade union.' To this definition the following proviso of sect. 23 of the Act of 1871 applies:—

'Provided that this Act shall not affect—

1. Any agreement between partners as to their own business ;
2. Any agreement between an employer and those employed by him as to such employment ;
3. Any agreement in consideration of the sale of the goodwill of a business or of instruction in any profession, trade, or handicraft.'

'Trade Dispute.'—In the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), and in the Trade Disputes Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. c. 47), the expression 'trade dispute' means any dispute between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen, which is connected with the employment or non-employment, or the terms of employment, or with the conditions of labour of any persons, and the expression 'workmen' means all persons employed in trade or industry, whether or not in the employment of the employer with whom a trade dispute arises (e).

Restraint of Trade.—By the Act of 1871, sect. 2, 'The purposes of any trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful, so as to render any member of such trade union liable to criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise' (f).

By sect. 3, 'The purposes of any trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be unlawful so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust.'

Offences punishable under the above Acts independently of conspiracy are dealt with in Book XI. Chapter VIII.

By sect. 3 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), as amended by sect. 1 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, 'An agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute (g) . . . shall not be indictable as a conspiracy if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime' (h).

(f) See Quinn v. Leatham [1901], A.C. 495, 526, Ld. Brampton. The Act is not limited to registered trade unions. See Chamberlain's Wharf, Ltd. v. Smith [1900], 2 Ch. 605. Registration is not compulsory, and if the purposes of the trade union are unlawful, registration is void (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31, s. 6).

(g) 6 Edw. VII. c. 47, s. 5 (2), defines 'trade dispute,' ut supra, and repeals the words between 'employer' and 'workman' in 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, s. 3, as to which, see Quinn v. Leatham [1901], A.C. 495.

(h) It has been held that this clause distinctly legalises strikes in the broadest terms, subject to the exceptions enumerated in ss. 4, 5. Gibson v. Lawson [1891],

2 Q.B. 545. (As to earlier views of the criminality of strikes, see Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 E. & B. 47. Walsby v. Anley, 30 L. J. M. C. 121. Erle on Trade Unions, 85.) Wood v. Bowron, L. R. 2 Q.B. 21; Wright on Conspiracy, 43. It would be more accurate to say that the Act takes away the criminality of combinations in the cases to which it applies. It does not affect civil remedies in respect of such combinations. Quinn v. Leatham [1901], A.C. 495, 511, Ld. Macnaghten; 527, Ld. Brampton. And the words 'the broadest terms' are too wide. 'It is plainly legal now for workmen to combine not to work except on their own terms. On the other hand, it is clearly illegal for them or anyone else, by force or threats of violence, to prevent other people from working on any terms which they think proper,' ibid. 541, Ld.

‘ An act done in pursuance of an agreement or combination by two or more persons shall, if done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, not be actionable unless the act, if done without such agreement or combination, would be actionable ’ (i).

Nothing in this section shall exempt from punishment any persons guilty of a conspiracy for which a punishment is awarded by any Act of Parliament.

Nothing in this section shall affect the law relating to riot, unlawful assembly, breach of the peace, or sedition, or any offence against the State or the Sovereign.

A crime for the purposes of this section means an offence punishable on indictment, or an offence which is punishable on summary conviction and for the commission of which the offender is liable, under the statute making the offence punishable, to be imprisoned either absolutely or at the discretion of the Court, as an alternative for some other punishment.

Where a person is convicted of any such agreement or combination as aforesaid to do or procure to be done an act which is punishable only on summary conviction, and is sentenced to imprisonment, the imprisonment shall not exceed three months, or such longer time, if any, as may have been prescribed by the statute for the punishment of the said act when committed by one person ’ (j).

The offences by individuals against the Act are dealt with post, Book XI. Chapter VIII.

Jurisdiction, Venue and Court of Trial.—A conspiracy within the realm, to do outside the realm, and outside the Admiralty jurisdiction acts which would be crimes by English law, appears to be indictable in England. In the case of conspiracy to murder, this is definitely provided by statute (k).

In Gibbon Wakefield's case (l), the conspiracy was to abduct an heiress and to marry her in Scotland. By the construction put by some of the judges on the statute on which the crime of abduction then depended, it was of the essence of the crime that the purposes of the abduction should be consummated, and they took the view that the conspiracy did not amount to an attempt to commit the full crime in England. But the law of conspiracy gave jurisdiction by attaching criminality to the agreement, as evidenced by acts done in England in furtherance of the design, although these acts did not amount to an attempt to commit the crime in England (m).

In R. v. Kohn (n), the prisoner, a foreigner, was indicted for conspiring at Ramsgate with the owner, the master, and the mate of a ship, to cast away the ship, with intent to prejudice the underwriters. (See

Lindley. He held that a combination to annoy a person's customers, so as to compel them to leave him unless he obeyed the combination, was not permitted by s. 3. See Lyons v. Wilkins (No. 1) [1896], 1 Ch. 811; No. 2 [1899], 1 Ch. 255.

(i) This paragraph was added by 6 Edw. VII. c. 47, s. 1, to override Quinn v. Leatham, ubi sup., and applies to civil remedies s. 3 of the Act of 1875, as amended in 1906.

24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 43.) The ship was a Prussian merchant vessel, and arrived at Ramsgate, and afterwards sailed thence, and she was in six days' time scuttled and sunk by the prisoner and others. The prisoner was apprehended, and made statements implicating himself, the captain, and the mate. He said that the mate had said in Ramsgate that the ship would never reach her place of destination, and spoke of the making away of the ship in an unlawful manner; and when the prisoner said: 'Then we had better sink her here at once on the bar,' the mate replied that was too close to land to make away with the ship in an unlawful manner, or to sink her. Martin, B., told the jury: 'The ship was a foreign ship, and she was sunk by foreigners far from the English coast, and so out of the jurisdiction of our courts. But the conspiracy in this country to commit the offence is criminal by our law. And this case does not raise the point which arose in R. v. Bernard, 1 F. & F. 240 (o), as to a conspiracy limited to a criminal offence to be committed abroad. For here, if the prisoner was party to the conspiracy at all, it was not so limited; for it was clearly contemplated that the ship might be destroyed off the bar at Ramsgate, which would be within the jurisdiction. The offence of conspiracy would be committed by any persons conspiring together to commit an unlawful act to the prejudice or injury of others, if the conspiracy was in this country, although the overt acts were abroad. . . . The question is, was it agreed by and between the prisoner and any other person at Ramsgate that the ship should be destroyed, whether at sea or in port?' (p)

In an indictment for conspiracy the venue should be laid where the conspiracy was, and not where the result of such conspiracy was put in execution (q). But there seems to be no reason why the crime of conspiracy, amounting only to a misdemeanor, may not be tried, wherever one distinct overt act of conspiracy is in fact committed, as well as the crime of high treason, in compassing and imagining the King's death, or in conspiring to levy war (r). So in R. v. Quinn (s), Fitzgibbon, L.J., said: 'Some one or more of the people who had the common intention must entertain or manifest it by something done within the venue, and they are entitled to be tried in any of the counties where that had taken place.' And in R. v. Bowes (t), the trial proceeded upon this principle; and, though no proof of actual conspiracy, embracing all the several conspirators in Middlesex, where the trial took place, was attempted to be given, and though the individual acts of some of the conspirators were wholly confined to other counties than Middlesex, yet the conspiracy as against all having been proved, from the community of criminal purpose, and by their joint co-operation in forwarding the objects of it, in different places and counties, the locality required for the purpose of trial was held to be satisfied by overt acts, done by some of them, in prosecution of the conspiracy in the county where the trial was had.

By the Quarter Sessions Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 38), s. 1, 'neither the justices of the peace acting in and for any county, riding, division, or liberty, nor the recorder of any borough, shall, at any session of the peace, or at any adjournment thereof, try any person or persons, for (inter alia) unlawful combinations and conspiracies, except conspiracies or combinations to commit any offence which such justices or recorder respectively have or has jurisdiction to try when committed by one person' (u).

To a count alleging that the prisoners conspired, by divers false pretences, against the form of the statute in that case made and provided, to defraud the prosecutor of his money it was objected that the facts ought to have been set out so as to shew that the offence intended to be committed was within the jurisdiction of the sessions, by whom the indictment had been tried. It was held (after verdict) that the jury must be taken to have found the accused guilty of conspiracy to defraud by such false pretences as were cognisable by a Court of Quarter Sessions (v).

In R. v. King (w) the Court refused to change the venue in an indictment for a conspiracy to destroy foxes and other vermin, on the ground that the persons who were likely to serve on the jury to try the indictment were much addicted to fox-hunting.

Indictment.—Indictments for conspiracy are subject to the provisions of the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17), as amended in 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 35) (ww). The technical averment of the agreement and conspiracy, generally used in the indictment, charges that the defendants 'did conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together'; but it is said that other words of the same import seem to be equally proper (x). To the counts for a conspiracy may be joined counts for such other misdemeanors as the circumstances of the case may seem to require (y).

But the Court may, if the joinder embarrasses the defendants, sever the trials of the counts or of the defendants (z), or put the prosecution to election which count they will proceed. Thus, where an indictment contained counts for a conspiracy and counts for libel, and there was no evidence to affect one of the two defendants as to the libel; Coleridge, J., at the close of the case for the prosecution, put the prosecutor to elect upon which charge he would proceed (a).

In R. v. Warren (b), an indictment for a long firm conspiracy contained, besides a general count for conspiracy between all the defendants, a series of counts charging other conspiracies between two or more of the defendants. Bosanquet, Common Serjeant, quashed the several counts, being of opinion that it was unfair to the defendants, and embar-passing to the Court and jury, to throw different crimes upon the accused separately, after giving evidence of a general conspiracy between them all. In R. v. Perryman (c), A. T. Lawrence, J., explained this ruling as meaning that, where separate and independent conspiracies were charged, they should not be included in one indictment, but that it did not preclude the inclusion in one indictment in cases where a conspiracy was formed, and other persons later came in and joined in an existing conspiracy.

Though it is usual first to state the conspiracy, and then to aver that in pursuance of it certain overt acts were done, it is sufficient to state the conspiring alone (d). Where the conspiracy is to commit a criminal offence it is not necessary to state the means by which the object was to be effected, as the conspiracy may be complete before the means to be used are taken into consideration. Thus in R. v. Gill (e), an indictment for conspiring by divers false pretences and subtle means and devices to get money from J. S., and cheat him thereof, is not objectionable on the ground that it is too general, or does not sufficiently show the corpus delicti, or specify any overt act. So a count alleging that the defendants 'unlawfully, fraudulently, and deceitfully did combine, conspire, confederate, and agree together by divers false pretences and subtle means and devices to obtain and acquire to themselves from one G. W. F. divers large sums of money of the monies of the said G. W. F., and to cheat and defraud him thereof,' has been held good (f). So R. v. Gompertz (g), where a count alleged that the defendants unlawfully, falsely, fraudulently, and deceitfully did conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together, by divers false pretences and indirect means, to cheat and defraud the prosecutor of his monies, the Court of Queen's Bench held that this count was good, on the authority of R. v. Gill (supra), and in Sydserrf v. R. (h). So where a count alleged that the defendants 'unlawfully, fraudulently, and deceitfully did conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together to cheat and defraud' the prosecutor 'of his goods and chattels;' upon error in the Exchequer Chamber it was held that this case was not distinguishable from R. v. Gill, and that the count was good (h).

Where the alleged conspiracy is to effect objects made unlawful by statute it is sufficient to follow the terms of the statute. But as a general rule where the conspiracy is not to commit an offence, but to do an unlawful act or a lawful act by unlawful means the indictment must, it is said, allege the doing of the unlawful act or the use of the unlawful means, or it will be insufficient (i).

A count alleged that C. C. died possessed of certain East India stock, and that the defendants conspired, &c., by divers false, fraudulent, and unlawful ways, means, and contrivances, and by false pretences and false swearing, unlawfully, &c., to obtain the means and power to and for S. P. of transferring and disposing of the said stock ; and that in pursuance of the said conspiracy the defendants afterwards caused a certain false deposition, purporting to have been made on oath by S. P. as one of the lawful children of the said C. C., wherein S. P. falsely stated that the widow of the said S. P. died without having taken upon her letters of administration of his goods, to be exhibited in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury ; and did then fraudulently procure letters of administration to be issued of the goods of C. C. to S. P., as one of the lawful children of C. C. After alleging two other overt acts of a similar kind, the count alleged that the defendants presented such letters of administration to the East India Company, and did, by such false ways, &c., false pretences and false swearing, fraudulently obtain the means and power to and for S. P. of transferring and disposing of the stock ; and that S. P. did transfer and dispose of the said stock, &c., with intent to defraud the widow of C. C. It was objected (1) that the conspiracy as alleged did not amount to any offence, as no legal meaning could be ascribed to obtaining ' the means and power ' of doing an act : (2) that the person intended to be defrauded ought to have been shewn with more certainty : (3) that it ought to have been stated to whom the stock belonged. But the Court held that the statement of the means used for effecting the object of the conspiracy was so interwoven with the charge of conspiracy as to shew on the face of the count an unlawful conspiracy. But if that were not so, the overt acts shewed an indictable misdemeanor (j).

Where the indictment is for conspiring to obtain property by ' false pretences ' these words are not construed in the technical sense in which they are used in indictments for obtaining by false pretences (k), nor is it necessary under such a count to prove a statutory false pretence (l), that the prosecutor was innocent of the crime imputed to him by the conspirators (m). Where the conspiracy is to accuse falsely of crime, the indictment need not aver the innocence of the prosecutor, the principle being that innocence must be intended until the contrary appears (n). In a case of a conspiracy to charge a person with being the father of a bastard child, it was held unnecessary to aver that the prosecutor was not the father. The words of the indictment were ' did falsely conspire falsely to charge,' &c. ; but even without those words the indictment was held sufficient, it being deemed unnecessary to state that the charge was false, or that the child was likely to become chargeable, &c. (o). And an indictment for a conspiracy was held good, although it was not alleged in the charge itself that the defendants conspired falsely to indict the prosecutor, and although it did not appear of what particular crime or offence they conspired to indict him, but only in general that the defendants did wickedly and maliciously conspire to indict and prosecute the prosecutor for a capital crime^(p).

(j) Wright v. R., 14 Q.B. 148, affirmed ibid. 180, on the authority of Sydserv v. R., supra. The indictment contained several other counts, varying the intent to defraud, and omitting some of the overt acts. The seventh count alleged that H. M. C. was entitled to the stock, and that the defendants conspired by false, &c., and unlawful ways and means, and by false pretences, unlawfully to obtain the means and power to and for S. P. of transferring and disposing of the said stock. The eleventh count stated that the defendants unlawfully conspired by false, &c., and unlawful pretences, &c., to obtain and get into their possession of and from one S. B. divers large sums of money with intent to defraud S. B. The Court of Queen's Bench arrested the judgment on these counts.

Where the act conspired to be done is in itself illegal (i.e., either wrongful or criminal), it is not necessary to state the means by which the conspiracy was effected. Thus where an indictment charged that the defendants conspired together by indirect means to prevent one H. B. from exercising the trade of a tailor, and it was contended that it should have stated the fact on which the conspiracy was founded,—the means used for the purpose; Lord Mansfield, C.J., said: ‘The conspiracy is stated and its object; it is not necessary that any means should be stated;’ and Buller, J., said: ‘If there be any objection it is that the indictment states too much; it would have been good certainly if it had not added “by indirect means,” and that will not make it bad’ (q). And where an indictment charged that the defendants conspired, by divers false pretences and subtle means and devices, to obtain from A. divers large sums of money, and to cheat and defraud him thereof; it was held that the gist of the offence being the conspiracy, it was quite sufficient to state that fact, and its object, and not necessary to set out the specific pretences. Bayley, J., said: ‘That when parties had once agreed to cheat a particular person of his monies, although they might not then have fixed on any means for that purpose, the offence of conspiracy was complete’ (r). But where the act only becomes illegal from the means used to effect it, the illegality of it should be explained by proper statements, as in the cases which have been cited of conspiracies to marry paupers (s).

In the indictment in O’Connell v. R. (t), the sixth count alleged that the defendants unlawfully and seditiously intending, by means of intimidation and the demonstration of great physical force, to procure and effect changes to be made in the government, laws, and constitution, unlawfully and seditiously did conspire, &c., to cause, and procure, &c., divers subjects of the Queen to meet and assemble together in large numbers, at various times and at different places in Ireland, for the unlawful and seditious purpose of obtaining, by means of intimidation to be thereby caused, and by means of the exhibition and demonstration of great physical force at such assemblies and meetings, changes in the government, laws,

(p) R. v. Spragg, 2 Burr. 993. Of this case, Tindal, C.J., in R. v. King, 7 Q.B. 782, said: ‘The point decided in that case appears to have been merely this, that, in an indictment for a conspiracy, though the conspiracy be insufficiently charged, yet if the rest of the indictment contains a good charge of a misdemeanor, the indictment is good. Lord Mansfield distinguishes between the allegation of the unexecuted conspiracy to prefer an indictment, as to the sufficiency of which he gave no opinion, and that of the actual preferring of the indictment maliciously and without probable cause, which he calls a completed conspiracy actually carried into execution; and this he holds to be clearly sufficient, and no doubt it was so; for, rejecting the averment of the unexecuted conspiracy, the indictment undoubtedly contained a complete description of a common-law misdemeanor.’

(r) R. v. Gill, 2 B. & Ald. 204. In R. v. Parker, 3 Q.B. 292, Williams, J., said: ‘It has been always thought that in R. v. Gill the extreme of laxity was allowed.’

and constitution, &c. The seventh count was like the sixth, with the addition, 'and especially, by the means aforesaid, to bring about and accomplish a dissolution of the legislative union now subsisting between Great Britain and Ireland.' Tindal, L.J., in giving to the House of Lords the opinions of the consulted judges, said: 'With respect, however, to the sixth and seventh counts, we all concur in opinion that they do not state the illegal purpose and design of the agreement entered into between the defendants with such proper and sufficient certainty as to lead to the necessary conclusion that it was an agreement to do an act in violation of the law. Each of those two counts does in substance state the agreement of defendants to have been "to cause and procure divers subjects to meet together in large numbers, for the unlawful and seditionous purpose of obtaining, by means of the intimidation to be thereby caused, and by means of the exhibition and demonstration of great physical force at such meetings, changes in the government, laws, and constitution of the realm." Now, though it may be inferred from this statement, that the object of the defendants was probably illegal, yet it does not appear to us to be so alleged with sufficient certainty. The word "intimidation" is not a technical word; it is not vocabulum artis, having a necessary meaning in a bad sense; it is a word in common use, employed on this occasion in its popular sense; and in order to give it any force, it ought at least to appear from the context what species of fear was intended, or upon whom such fear was intended to operate. But these counts contain no intimation whatever upon what persons this intimidation was intended to operate; it is left in complete uncertainty whether the intimidation was directed against the peaceable inhabitants of the surrounding places, against the subjects of the Queen dwelling in Ireland in general, against persons in the exercise of public authority there, or even against the legislature of the realm. Again, the mere allegation that these changes were to be obtained by the exhibition and demonstration of physical force, without any allegation that such force was to be used, or threatened to be used, seems to us to mean no more than the mere display of numbers, and consequently to carry the matter no further.'

In an indictment for conspiring to pervert the course of justice by producing in evidence a false certificate of a justice of peace, it was held unnecessary to set forth that the defendants knew at the time of the conspiracy that the contents of the certificate were false, on the ground that it is criminal for persons with intent to obstruct the course of justice to conspire to state a fact as true, which they do not know to be true; and that the defendants were bound to have known that the fact was true which they agreed to certify as such (u).

The question with respect to the sufficiency of an indictment for conspiracy is whether the counts are framed with sufficient certainty, with respect to the substance of the charge of conspiracy; for if any such counts are framed in so loose, uncertain, or inapt a manner, that the defendants might have availed themselves of the insufficiency

(u) R. v. Mawbey, 6 T. R. 619. Ante, p. 164. Lawrence, J., said that it was not unlike the case of perjury where a man swears to a particular fact without knowing at the time whether the fact be true or false; which is as much perjury as if he knew the fact to be false, and equally indictable. Vide post, p. 476.

of the indictment upon demurrer, there was nothing to prevent them from taking the same advantage of the objection by appeal, or case stated, except where the defect is such as would be cured by verdict (v).

Particularity.—The Court refused to quash on motion an indictment charging the defendants with conspiring ‘to defraud J. W. of divers goods, and in pursuance of that conspiracy defrauding him of divers goods, to wit, of the value of £100’; on the ground that the gist of the indictment was the conspiracy, and that there might be so much uncertainty in the transaction, which was the subject of the indictment, that the allegation could not be made with greater certainty, as the conspiracy might be to defraud the prosecutor, not of any particular goods, but of any goods the prisoner could get hold of (w).

In R. v. de Berenger (x), it was held that an indictment which alleged an intention to injure the subjects who should purchase public funds on a particular day was good; for it followed from the nature of the charge that the persons could not be named, because the charge was of conspiracy on a previous day to raise the funds on a future day, so that it was uncertain who would be the purchasers; and the offence being to raise the funds on a future day, its object was to injure all those who should become purchasers on that day, and not some individuals in particular (x).

So where a count stated that the defendants conspired to defraud divers of Her Majesty’s subjects, who should bargain with the defendants for the sale of goods of the said subjects without making payment for the same, with intent to acquire to the said defendants divers sums of money; it was held that it was no valid objection that the count did not state what particular creditors the defendants meant to defraud; for if the offence went no further than the conspiracy, it could not be known what particular persons fell into the snare. But the count was held defective for not stating with sufficient particularity what the defendants conspired to do; for obtaining goods without making payment was not necessarily a fraud, as the words of the indictment might apply to the obtaining goods to sell on commission (y). The second count alleged that the defendants being ‘indebted to divers persons in large sums of money,’ conspired to defraud the said creditors of the defendants of payment of their said debts, and in pursuance of the said conspiracy unlawfully did execute a certain false and fraudulent deed of bargain and sale and assignment of certain fixtures, stock in trade, and goodwill, of great value, belonging to the said defendants, from two of themselves to the third, for divers false and fraudulent considerations, with intent thereby to procure to the said defendants divers sums of money and other emoluments. This count was held bad because it did not state in what respect the deed was false and fraudulent, and therefore the ticular goods were not specified, and probably only so much as shewed that was stated in the report. In an indictment for larceny the goods stolen must be specified, post, Vol. ii. p. 1296.

Court had only the prosecutor's general opinion upon this point, not the facts on which it was founded (z).

An indictment alleged that an issue in an action between H. B. and G. C. was tried, and that the plaintiff recovered a verdict for £17, and that the judge certified that execution ought to issue forthwith, and that the defendants 'did conspire falsely and fraudulently to cheat and defraud the said H. B. of the fruits and advantages of the said verdict and certificate.' Denman, C.J., held the indictment bad, as the allegation was too general, and did not convey any specific idea which the mind could lay hold of, to determine whether any unlawful act had been done or attempted, and because the terms used did not import in what manner the plaintiff was to be deprived of the fruits and advantages of his verdict, and it was not even alleged that the verdict would lead to any fruits and advantages (a). Where a count for conspiracy is framed in a general form in accordance with the rule in R. v. Gill, the Court may make an order for particulars giving such information as would be given in a special count, even though the details are contained in the depositions taken at the preliminary inquiry (b).

In the British Bank case an order had been made on the first day of the trial that particulars of Cameron's debt, which was stated to be £36,000, should be delivered to him; and it was objected that until the particulars had been given that case could not be gone into. It was answered that Cameron had had access to the accounts for some months: and Campbell, C.J., ruled that the Crown could not be precluded from giving evidence on that part of the case (c).

Where an indictment charged a conspiracy between the defendants and divers other persons, not adding 'to the jurors unknown,' the prosecution were ordered to give the names of such persons (d).

The particulars need not state the specific acts the defendants are charged with having done, or the times or places at which such acts are alleged to have taken place. But where a count alleges overt acts, the Court will not order particulars to be delivered, where there is no affidavit on the part of the defendant that he has no knowledge of the overt acts charged, and does not possess sufficient information to enable him to meet them. The particulars may be ordered to be given forthwith, so as to avoid the necessity of adjourning the trial (e).

In R. v. Parker (f), the first count alleged that the defendants, intending to cheat and defraud divers of the subjects of the Queen of their goods, &c., unlawfully conspired by divers false pretences to obtain from

F., cotton yarn manufacturers and copartners, &c., divers goods of great value, to wit, &c., and to cheat and defraud the said liege subjects of the said goods. The count then set out several overt acts as to obtaining goods from the parties above named, and concluded by averring that the defendants did by the means aforesaid obtain from the said T. T. and D. L., and E. F. and R. F., &c., the goods aforesaid, and did cheat and defraud them thereof. The second count was similar, but did not state the overt acts. The third count stated the conspiracy to be to cause it to be believed that one of the defendants, who was then an uncertificated bankrupt, was not B. P., but J. P., and that he carried on an extensive shipping business, and was a man of large property, and had a large capital in the business, and by means of the said belief to obtain from divers liege subjects (not naming them) divers goods, wares, and merchandise, and to cheat and defraud the said liege subjects of the said goods, &c. The fourth count charged that the defendants unlawfully combined by divers false pretences to obtain from divers liege subjects (not naming them) divers other goods of great value, and to cheat and defraud the said liege subjects of the said goods, &c. The defendants having been convicted, judgment was arrested on the ground that the indictment was bad for not stating to whom the goods belonged, it being consistent with the statements in the indictment that the goods belonged to the defendants. The Court said that where the object charged was a conspiracy to obtain from certain persons named divers goods, and to cheat and defraud them of the same, and they were obtained, and the parties defrauded, no precedent was to be found to shew that an indictment was good which omitted to state whose the goods were. The first count, therefore, was imperfect, and the objection applied more strongly to the fourth count, where the conspiracy charged was to obtain divers goods and to cheat and defraud certain persons named, not with intent to cheat and defraud them of the same, though perhaps that would have made no difference. As there was no statement to whom the goods belonged, the charge did not, in the view of the Court, of necessity, import any offence, as it was consistent with an attempt by the defendants to obtain by some means their own goods unlawfully detained from them; and to hold that the use of the words 'to cheat and defraud' necessarily implied that the goods belonged to the parties who were stated to be defrauded, would be letting in a generality, which was not shewn ever to be allowed (g).

(g) See R. v. Bullock, Dears. 653. Although there appears at first sight to be some little discrepancy in the cases upon this point, perhaps they are not irreconcilable. The correct distinction to be drawn from them appears to be this, that where there has been merely a conspiracy for a particular purpose (e.g., to raise the funds), and such conspiracy has not been carried into execution, an indictment in general terms will be sufficient; but where there has not only been a conspiracy, but such conspiracy has been carried into effect, there the indictment ought to specify precisely what has been effected, as the parties injured, the property obtained, and to whom it belonged. The reason of such a distinction is that in the one case it is impracticable to state with minuteness what never was carried beyond the intention, whereas in the other case what was actually effected may easily be stated. The case may be compared to the cases of burglary with intent to steal, and burglary accompanied by an actual stealing; in the former it is sufficient to state that the prisoner

In an indictment for obtaining property by false pretences, it is not necessary to state to whom the property belongs (h), and it is submitted that it is not necessary to have greater particularity in indictments for conspiracy to obtain by false pretences (i).

In R. v. Blake (j), a count alleged that the defendants did unlawfully combine, conspire, confederate, and agree together to cause and procure certain goods, in respect whereof certain duties of customs were due and payable to the Queen, to be taken away from the port of London and delivered to the respective owners thereof without payment to the Queen of a great part of the duties of customs payable thereon with intent to defraud the Queen in her revenue of the customs. A motion was made to arrest judgment on the ground that the count was insufficient, because no description of the goods was given, by which it could be judged whether the goods were liable to duty. But the Court held that it was not necessary to specify the goods; that it was matter of evidence what the goods were to which the conspiracy related; that the parties might have conspired without knowing what they were; and that they might have laid their heads together to cheat the Queen of whatever customable goods they could pass.

In R. v. King (k), a count alleged that W. H. King, E. A. Birch, and A. D. Phillips, did 'unlawfully combine, conspire, confederate and agree together to cheat and defraud certain liege subjects of our Lady the Queen, being tradesmen, of divers large quantities of their goods and chattels: ' and that B., in pursuance of the said conspiracy, did fraudulently order and obtain upon credit from W. A. W. and C. W. divers goods, &c., belonging to the said W. A. W. and C. W.; from F. B. and W. J., divers goods, &c., belonging to the said F. B. and W. J.; and from divers other tradesmen whose names are to the jurors unknown, divers other goods, &c., belonging to the said last mentioned persons; and that E. A. B., 'in further pursuance of the said conspiracy,' and in broke and entered the house with intent to steal the goods (without describing them) of one A. B.; and in the latter the goods stolen must be particularised. So where a conspiracy has been detected before it is carried into execution so far as to ascertain the parties intended to be injured by it, an indictment would be good without naming such parties. R. v. de Berenger, ante, p. 170. But where the conspiracy had proceeded so far as to fix the parties intended to be injured, such parties should be expressly named, and if the object was to defraud them of their goods, or their goods had been actually obtained thereby, the indictment should state in the one case the intent to defraud them of their goods, and in the other that they were defrauded of their goods. This position has been fully borne out by R. v. King, infra. It may, perhaps, admit of some doubt whether the possibility of the goods belonging to the defendants in the principal case necessarily rendered the indictment bad; for as a party may be guilty of larceny in stealing his own goods, there seems no reason why parties who conspired to obtain their own goods from another, and thereby to cheat and defraud him, under such circumstances as did not amount to larceny, should not be indictable for a conspiracy. The better ground to rest the decision upon would seem to be that the indictment did not adopt such a degree of particularity as the facts enabled the prosecutor to do, and the rules of criminal pleading require to be adopted where it is practicable. order that the said goods might be taken in execution as hereinafter mentioned, did order the said goods to be delivered at her house ; and that the said goods were so delivered, and no payment made for the said goods by any of the defendants at any time ; and that, ' in further pursuance of the said conspiracy,' the said E. A. B. did procure the said goods to remain in her house until they were taken in execution as hereinafter mentioned, and that the defendants, ' in further pursuance of the said conspiracy,' did falsely and fraudulently pretend that certain debts were due from the said E. A. B. to the said W. H. K. and A. D. P. respectively, and that the said W. H. K. and A. D. P., ' in further pursuance of the said conspiracy, and in order to obtain payment of such false and fictitious debts,' did commence by collusion with the said E. A. B. separate actions against the said E. A. B. And that afterwards, ' in further pursuance of the said conspiracy,' judgments were collusively signed by the said W. A. K. and A. D. P. in each of the said actions for want of a plea. And that afterwards, ' in further pursuance of the said conspiracy, writs of feri facias were collusively sued out upon the said judgments ; by virtue of which writs the said goods were, before the expiration of the said respective times of credit, taken in execution and sold in due course of law to satisfy the fictitious debts falsely and fraudulently alleged to be due from the said E. A. B. And so the jurors aforesaid find that the defendants, in manner and by the means aforesaid, unlawfully did cheat and defraud the said W. A. W. and C. W., F. B. and W. J., &c., of their said goods ' (l). A conviction on this indictment was quashed in the Exchequer Chamber. Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said : ' The charge is that the defendants conspired to cheat and defraud divers liege subjects, being tradesmen, of their goods, &c. ; and the objection is that these persons should have been designated by their Christian and surnames, or an excuse given, such as that their names are to the jurors unknown ; because this allegation imports that the intention of the conspirators was to cheat certain definite individuals, who must always be described by name, or a reason given why they are not ; and if the conspiracy was to cheat indefinite individuals, as for instance those whom they should afterwards deal with, or afterwards fix upon, it ought to have been described in appropriate terms, shewing that the objects of the conspiracy were, at the time of making it, unascertained, as was in fact done in the case of R. v. de Berenger (m), and R. v. Peck (n) ; and it was argued that if, on the trial of this indictment, it had appeared that the intention was not to cheat certain definite individuals, but such as the conspirators should afterwards trade with or select, they would have been entitled to an acquittal ; and we all agree in this view of the case, and think that the reasons assigned against the validity of this part of the indictment are correct. But then it was urged on the part of the Crown that this defect in the allegation of the conspiracy was cured by referring to the whole of the indictment, the part stating the overt acts as well as that stating the conspiracy ; and R. v. Spragg (o) was cited as an authority that the whole ought to be read together. But if we examine the allegations in this indictment, there is no sufficient description of any act done after the conspiracy which amounts to a misdemeanor at common law. None of the overt acts are shewn by proper averments to be indictable. The obtaining goods, for instance, from certain named individuals upon credit, without any averment of the use of false tokens, is not an indictable misdemeanor ; and if it is said that because it is averred to have been done in pursuance of the conspiracy before mentioned, it must be taken to be equivalent to an averment that the conspiracy was to cheat the named individuals of their goods, the answer is, first, that it does not necessarily follow, because the goods were obtained in pursuance of the conspiracy to cheat some persons, that the conspiracy was to cheat the persons from whom the goods were obtained ; they might have been obtained from A. in the execution of an ulterior purpose to cheat B. of his goods. And secondly, if the averment is to be taken to be equivalent to one that the goods were obtained from the named individuals in pursuance of an illegal conspiracy to cheat and defraud those named individuals of their goods, it would still be defective, as not containing a direct and positive averment that the defendants did conspire to cheat and defraud those persons, which an indictment for a conspiracy, where the conspiracy is itself the crime, ought certainly to contain. The other allegations of what are termed overt acts are open to the same objection. In none is there complete description of a common-law misdemeanor independently of the conspiracy ; and the allegation of the conspiracy is insufficient, and not direct and positive. For these reasons the judgment must be reversed' (p).

In R. v. Button (q), a count charged that the defendants were employed by L. as his servants in the management of the business as a dyer, and that it was their duty as such servants to employ the vats and dye of L. for his benefit and for dyeing such materials as might belong to themselves or be intrusted to them by L. for those purposes, and for no other purposes and on no other materials ; and that the defendants unlawfully conspired, fraudulently, and without the consent of L., to employ the vats and dye in dyeing materials not belonging to themselves and not intrusted to them by L., and to obtain thereby to themselves large profits, and to deprive L. of the use and benefit of the said vats and dye ; and that the defendants, in pursuance of the said conspiracy, wilfully and without the consent of L., received into their possession divers large quantities of materials, and wilfully and without the consent of L., at his expense and with his said vats and dye, dyed the same materials for their own profit and benefit. It was objected that the count did not shew that the goods which the defendants dyed were not their own, and that it appeared by the record that they had permission to dye their own goods ; but the count was held good on the ground that it was clear that the essential part of the count was the charge of a conspiracy ; so that

(p) In the argument in the Court of Queen's Bench in this case it was also objected that the conspiracy ought to have been laid to defraud divers tradesmen of their goods 'respectively,' but the Court held that this was not necessary, and this point does not appear to have been raised in the Exchequer Chamber.

if the evidence proved the conspiracy the count would have been sufficiently proved, even if there was no proof of the overt acts, i.e., that the conspiracy was carried into effect (r).

Evidence.—The existence of a conspiracy is in most cases ‘a matter of inference deduced from criminal (or unlawful) acts done in pursuance of a common criminal purpose’ (s).

The evidence in support of an indictment for a conspiracy is generally circumstantial; and it is not necessary to prove any direct concert, or even any meeting of the conspirators, as the actual fact of conspiracy may be collected from the collateral circumstances of the case (t). Although the common design is the root of the charge, it is not necessary to prove that the defendants came together, and actually agreed in terms to have the common design, and to pursue it by common means, and so to carry it into execution, for in many cases of the most clearly established conspiracies there are no means of proving any such thing (v). If, therefore, two persons pursue by their acts the same object, often by the same means, one performing one part of an act, and the other another part of the same act, so as to complete it, with a view to the attainment of the common object they were pursuing, the jury are free to infer that they have been engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object (w). It is not necessary to prove the existence of a conspiracy before giving in evidence of the acts of the alleged conspirators, and isolated acts may be proved as steps by which the conspiracy itself may be established (x). In R. v. Duffield (y), Erle, J., directed the jury that it does not happen once in a thousand times when the offence of conspiracy is (r) There was another count similar to the above, which was objected to on the ground that it did not allege any duty in the defendants not to employ the dye for their own profit; but the Court held it good, as the allegation of the conspiracy was sufficient. There was also a question as to the conspiracy having merged in the felony decided in this case. But as 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 12, has got rid of all such questions it has been omitted. In R. v. Ward, 1 Cox, 101, a count alleged that the defendants, having in their possession two horses, conspired by divers false pretences to obtain large sums of money from such persons as might be desirous of purchasing the said horses, and to cheat and defraud such persons of such sums of money, and that the defendants, in pursuance of the said conspiracy, made certain false pretences, which were set out; and that the defendants, in pursuance of the said conspiracy, did obtain from W. A. an order for the payment of £115 10s. It was objected that this count was bad, because it did not shew that W. A. was one of the persons who was desirous of purchasing the horses, and therefore he was not shewn to be within the objects of the conspiracy. The count is said to have been held bad. If correctly reported this ruling is clearly erroneous.

The allegation that the defendants did obtain the money from W. A. ‘in pursuance of the conspiracy’ is the regular mode of connecting the overt act with the conspiracy, especially where, as in this case, the overt act could not be foreseen at the time when the conspiracy was entered into. The overt act, therefore, was well laid. But even if it had been otherwise, the count was good without it; for the conspiracy was clearly well laid; and where that is the case, an acquittal of the overt act is immaterial. R. v. Starling, 1 Lev. 125, shews that the overt act is in such a case immaterial.

tried that anybody comes before the jury to say that he was present at the time when the parties did conspire together, and when they agreed to carry out their unlawful purposes ; that species of evidence is hardly ever to be adduced before a jury ; but the unlawful conspiracy is to be inferred from the conduct of the parties ; and if several men are seen taking several steps, all tending towards one obvious purpose, and they are seen through a continued portion of time taking steps that lead to one end, it is for the jury to say whether those persons had not combined together to bring about that end, which their conduct appears so obviously adapted to effectuate. In R. v. Cope (z), a husband and wife, and their servants, were indicted for conspiring to ruin the trade of the King's card-maker. The evidence against them was, that they had at several times given money to his apprentices to put grease into the paste, which had spoiled the cards ; but there was no account given that ever more than one at a time was present, though it was proved they had all given money in their turns ; it was objected that this could not be a conspiracy, on the ground that several persons might do the same thing, without having any previous communication with each other. But it was ruled that the defendants being all of a family, and concerned in making of cards, it would amount to evidence of a conspiracy. And it seems to have been ruled that a banker who permitted a sum of money to be lodged at his house, to be paid over for corruptly procuring an appointment under government, might be indicted for conspiring with those who were to procure the appointment, and receive the money (a).

The following rule has been suggested with respect to the acts or words of one conspirator being evidence against the others. Where several persons are proved to have combined together for the same illegal purpose, any act done by one of the party, in pursuance of the original concerted plan, and with reference to the common object, is in the contemplation of law the act of the whole party, and therefore, the proof of such act would be evidence against any of the others who were engaged in the same conspiracy ; and declarations, made by one of the party at the time of doing such illegal act, seem not only to be evidence against himself, as tending to determine the quality of the act, but against the rest of the party, who are as much responsible as if they had themselves done the act. But what one of the party may have been heard to say at some other time, as to the share which some of the others had in the execution of the common design, or as to the object of the conspiracy, is not admissible as evidence to affect them on their trial for the same offence (b). And, in general, enough must be proved to make a case for the Court, or proof of concert and connection must be given, before evidence is admissible of the acts or declarations of any person done or made in the absence of the prisoner (c). It is for the Court to judge whether such connection has been sufficiently established ; but when that has been done, the doctrine applies that each party is an agent for the others, and that an act done by one in furtherance of the unlawful design, is in law the act of all, and that a declaration made by one of the parties, at the time of doing such an act, is evidence against the others. Thus, where S. was indicted for treason, and one of the overt acts charged was conspiring with J. and others to collect intelligence, and to communicate it to the King's enemies in France, &c., after evidence had been given to connect the prisoner with J. in the conspiracy as charged, the Secretary of State for the Foreign department was called to prove that a letter of J.'s, containing treasonable information, had been transmitted to him from abroad, but in a confidential way, which made it impossible for him to divulge by whom it was communicated; and such letter was received in evidence (d). So, after evidence had been given of a treasonable conspiracy, in which the prisoner was concerned, it was held that papers found in the lodging of a co-conspirator, at a period subsequent to the apprehension of the prisoner, might be read in evidence, upon strong presumptive proof being given that the lodgings had not been entered by any one in the interval between the apprehension of the prisoner and the finding of the papers, although no absolute proof had been given of their existence previous to the prisoner's apprehension (e). But it seems that if such papers had not been proved to have been intimately and immediately connected with the objects of the conspiracy, they would not have been admissible; as, in the same case, a paper containing seditious questions and answers, found in the possession of a co-conspirator, was not read in evidence, the court doubting whether it was sufficiently connected by evidence with the object of the conspiracy to render it admissible (f).

Every person concerned in any of the criminal parts of the transaction alleged as a conspiracy may be found guilty, though there is no evidence that such persons joined in concerting the plan, or that they ever met the others, and though it is probable they never did, and though some of them only join in the latter parts of the transaction, and probably did not know of the matter until some of the prior parts of the transaction were complete (g). If several persons meet from different motives, and then join in effecting one common and illegal object, it is a conspiracy. Where, therefore, upon an information for a conspiracy to ruin M., an actor, in his profession, it was objected that in support of the prosecution evidence should be given of a previous meeting of the parties accused for the purpose of confederating to carry their object into execution; Sir James Mansfield, C.J., overruled the objection, saying that if a number of persons met together for different purposes, and afterwards joined to execute one common purpose to the injury of the person, property, profession, or character of a third party, it was a conspiracy,

(f) R. v. Watson, supra. But it was held that if proof were to be given that the instrument was to be used for the purposes of the conspiracy, it would clearly be admissible.

(g) R. v. Lord Grey, 9 St. Tr. 127. R. v. Murphy, 8 C. & P. 297, Coleridge, J. R. v. Parnell, 14 Cox, 508, 515.

and it was not necessary to prove any previous consultation or plan among the defendants against the person intended to be injured (h).

It appears to have been held that upon an indictment for a conspiracy, where, from the nature of the case, it would be difficult to prove the privy of the parties accused, without first proving the existence of a conspiracy, the prosecutor may go into general evidence of its nature, before it is brought home to the defendants. The indictment charged the defendants, who were journeymen shoemakers, with a conspiracy to raise their wages; and evidence was offered on the part of the prosecution of a plan for a combination amongst the journeymen shoemakers, formed and printed several years before, regulating their meetings, subscriptions, and other matters for their mutual government in forwarding their designs. This evidence was objected to by counsel for the defendant; but Kenyon, C.J., said, that if a general conspiracy existed, general evidence might be given of its nature, and of the conduct of its members, so as to implicate men who stood charged with acting upon the terms of it years after those terms had been established, and who might reside at a great distance from the place where the general plan was carried on; and he, therefore, permitted a person, who was a member of this society, to prove the printed regulations and rules of the society, and that he and others acted under them, in execution of the conspiracy charged upon the defendants, as evidence introductory to the proof that they were members of such society, and equally concerned; but he observed, that it would not be evidence to affect the defendants until they were made parties to the same conspiracy (i). And in several important cases, evidence has been first given of a general conspiracy before any proof of the particular part which the accused parties have taken (j).

The prosecutor may either prove the conspiracy, which renders the acts of the conspirators admissible in evidence, or he may prove the acts of the different persons, and thus prove the conspiracy. Where, therefore, a party met, which was joined by the prisoner next day, it was held that directions given by one of the party on the day of their meeting as to where they were to go and for what purpose, were admissible, and the case was said to fall within R. v. Hunt (3 B. & Ald. 566), where evidence of drilling at a different place two days before and hissing an obnoxious person was held receivable (k).

But after such general evidence has been received the parties before the Court must be affected for their share of it. And mere detached declarations and confessions of persons not defendants, not made in the prosecution of the object of the conspiracy, seem not to be evidence to prove its existence, although consultations for the purpose, and letters written in prosecution of the design, but not sent, are admissible (l). The admissibility of the act or declaration of a co-conspirator against the party defendant before the court, does not depend on whether such co-conspirator is indicted or not, or tried or not with the defendant (m). The evidence is admitted on the ground that the act or declaration of one is the act or declaration of both when united in one common design.

Where the indictment charged the defendants with conspiring to cause themselves to be believed persons of large property for the purpose of defrauding tradesmen, evidence was given of their having hired a house in a fashionable street, and represented themselves to one tradesman employed to furnish it as people of large fortune ; and then a witness was called to prove that at a different time they had made a similar representation to another tradesman. The evidence of this witness was objected to on the ground that it was not competent to the prosecutor to prove various acts of this kind, and that he was bound to select and confine himself to one. But Ellenborough, C.J., said, ' This is an indictment for a conspiracy to carry on the business of common cheats, and cumulative instances are necessary to prove the offence ' (n). And, in a similar case, the same course was allowed as to acts done both in and out of the county where the indictment charged the conspiracy to have been (o).

Upon an indictment for conspiring to annoy a broker who distrained for church-rates, it was proved that one of the defendants, in the presence of the other, excited the persons assembled at a public meeting to go in a body to the broker's house. It was held that evidence was admissible to shew that they did so go, although neither of the defendants went with them, but that evidence of what a person, who was at the meeting, said a few days after the meeting when he himself was distrained on for church-rates, was not admissible (p). And where an indictment charged the defendant with conspiring with J., who had been previously convicted of treason, to raise insurrections and riots, and it was proved that the defendant had been a member of a Chartist association, and that J. was also a member, and that in the evening of November 3 the defendant had been at J.'s house, and was heard to direct the people there assembled to go to the race-course, where J. had gone on before with others ; it was held that a direction given by J. in the forenoon of the same day to certain parties to meet on the race-course was admissible ; and it being further proved that J. and the persons assembled on the race-course went thence to the New Inn, it was held that what J. said at the New Inn was admissible, as it was all part of the same transaction (q).

of that prisoner within the prison, and articles found upon him, were admissible in evidence against the persons so charged (r).

On an indictment under sect. 3 of the Treason Felony Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 12), which makes it a felony to compass, &c., to deprive the Queen of her crown or to levy war, &c., it appeared that the prisoners from July 26 to August 16 had attended meetings where plans for securing the people's charter and the repeal of the union were organised, and took a prominent part at those meetings; large bodies of men were formed into societies, with class leaders, &c.; some of them were selected and organised as fighting men, and an attempt at insurrection was to be made on August 16; and on that night a great number of the conspirators were found at the several places of meeting previously fixed, provided with arms, &c. A witness stated that at a meeting, at which none of the prisoners were present, he received a leaf of a book from one B., which was to serve as an introduction to a subsequent meeting; and on July 20 he attended a second meeting, and produced the leaf; the chairman compared it with a book, and the witness was admitted. The prisoners were not shewn to have been parties to the conspiracy at the time. But it was held that the witness might prove what B. said to him when he gave him the leaf, and also what took place at the second meeting, on the ground that the prosecution had a right to go into general evidence of the nature of the combination between the persons assembled, though the prisoners might not be present (s). And it having been proved that a large number of armed men were found assembled at a public-house on August 16, the time which had been fixed for the general outbreak, but none of these men had been previously connected with the conspiracy, nor did it appear that the house had ever been recognised as a place of meeting; it was held that evidence was admissible of what was done at that public-house; because it appeared that on this day there was to be a collection of armed persons (t).

In R. v. Duffield (u), on an indictment for conspiracy to prevent workmen from continuing in their service as tin-plate workers, it appeared that the workmen had been holding shop meetings and discussions, and the prosecutor, a manufacturer, had published a placard offering constant employment to tin-plate workers, and after that a handbill was circulated about the town, and copies of it stuck up in the windows of beer-shops and public-houses, and one of them in a window of a public-house frequented by the tin-plate workers, and another at a public-house at which one P., G., and W., alleged conspirators, lodged, and the defendants had been continually into those houses whilst the bill was in the windows. The bill was signed by P. as general secretary, and mentioned G. and W. as having visited the prosecutor, but did not mention any of the defendants. Erle, J., held that the bill was not admissible as the act of the defendants, either by themselves or as published or recognised by them. 'You may make a handbill evidence against a man, if I may so say, by retrospective light arising from his conduct. If a handbill says that certain things will be done by certain persons, and that handbill is circulated, where those persons probably saw it, and they do the very thing that the handbill indicates they would do, when that is in evidence, I am of opinion that the bill would be admissible against them ; but we are not at that stage yet.' But in R. v. Rowlands (v), another indictment arising out of the same transactions, where, in addition to the evidence in the previous case, it was proved that R. had been at the 'Swan' whilst the bill was exhibited there, and P. had been seen going in and out, and the bill was in such a situation that he must have seen it ; Erle, J., held that it was admissible. ' If it is evidence against any one of the defendants, it is admissible.' ' I believe it is admissible against those in respect of whom I draw the inference that they saw it in the window ; those in respect of whom it announces any intention. G. and W. are the two that are named in it. It purports to be an instrument by P., and I think there is evidence before me, from which I am of opinion that P. had seen that instrument, and it is probable, by his not objecting to it, that he permitted his name to be used to that instrument.' ' I am clear that it is evidence as against one of the defendants, it being published in his name, and, according to the evidence, being probably seen by him ' (w).

In R. v. Blake (x), on an information for a conspiracy with one T. to pass imported goods without paying the full duty, it appeared that T. acted as agent for the importer of the goods, and B. as landing-waiter at the Custom-house, and that it was T.'s duty to make an entry known describing the quantity and particulars of the goods necessary to determine the amount of duty. The entry was left at the Custom-house, and the particulars were copied into a Blue-book at the Custom-house, which was delivered to B., whose duty was to examine the goods, and, if he found them correspond with the particulars in the Blue-book, to write 'Correct' across the entry, whereupon the goods would be delivered to the importer upon payment of the duties so ascertained. The goods were passed to T., the duty having been paid on the entry made out by T., which corresponded with the entry in the Blue-book. It was then proposed to put in T.'s Day-book, and to shew by T.'s own entry therein that the quantity of goods was much larger than appeared by the Perfect Entry and the Blue-book, and that the importer had been charged the duties by T. on such larger amount, and had paid them accordingly. It was objected for B.—T. not being on his trial—that the entry in T.'s book was not evidence against B. ; but Denman, C.J., admitted the evidence ; and on a motion for a new trial it was held that the Day-book was evidence of something done in the course of the transaction, and was properly admitted as a step in the proof of the conspiracy (x). Evidence was also given to shew that a cheque drawn by T. for a certain sum, and dated after the goods were passed, had been cashed, and the proceeds traced to B. It was then proposed to put in evidence the counterfoil of the cheque in T.'s cheque-book, on which was written an account shewing that the cheque was drawn for a sum amounting to half the profit arising from transactions, including the alleged fraud on the revenue, as manifested by the several items in that account. It was held that this evidence was not admissible, for the conspiracy to defraud the customs had been carried into effect before the cheque was drawn; and the writing on the counterfoil was in effect a declaration by T. for what purpose he had drawn the cheque, and how the money was to be applied; and no declaration of T. could be received in evidence against B. which was made in B.'s absence, unless it related to the furtherance of the common object; which this did not (y).

On an indictment for conspiracy to defraud the shareholders of the British Bank by falsely representing its affairs to be prosperous, the examination of one of the defendants, which had been taken on a petition for winding up the bank after the date of the alleged conspiracy, was tendered in evidence. This examination shewed that this defendant was aware of the insolvency of the bank, and alleged that the other directors had the same knowledge. It was objected that this examination was not evidence of any act done in furtherance of the conspiracy; and that it was not admissible until the other defendants were connected with this defendant in the conspiracy. But Campbell, C.J. (after consulting the other judges of the Queen's Bench), said: 'We are all of opinion that the deposition is admissible against this defendant, as tending to shew his knowledge before and at the time of his committing the overt act, but not as against the other defendants. Therefore only such parts should be read as refer to the deponent alone' (z).

Where an indictment alleged that the defendants conspired falsely to accuse the prosecutor of having feloniously forged a cheque, and that in execution of such conspiracy a letter was written by one of the defendants, in which he stated that he had been employed to investigate the circumstances attending the forging of the cheque, and proof was given of the letter, and also of conversations referring in like manner to a cheque, which the defendants charged the prosecutor with having forged, but the cheque itself was not produced; it was objected that the cheque was so incorporated with the evidence, that the prosecutor was not entitled to prove the conversations without producing the cheque to which they referred, which it appeared from the evidence was in existence, and in the possession of the defendants. Tenterden, C.J., ruled that it was not essential to prove the contents of the cheque or to produce it, but that it was enough to take the conversations as they passed; and on a motion for a new trial this ruling was affirmed, the Court being of opinion that the whole of the charge against the defendants was founded on the letter set out in the indictment, which was written by one of the defendants upon the application of the other; and they having taken upon themselves to treat as an existing thing a cheque, it was not necessary, on the part of the prosecutor, to produce it in evidence, even although it appeared that it actually existed. But it might be a fabrication on the part of the defendants; there might be no such cheque, and then it could not be produced (a).

(y) R. v. Blake, supra.(z) R. v. Esdaile, 1 F. & F. 213.(a) R. v. Ford and Aldridge, 1 N. & M. 776.

A count alleged that the defendants, a husband, wife, and daughter, being in low and indigent circumstances, conspired to cause the husband to be reputed and believed to be a person of considerable property, and in opulent circumstances, for the purpose and with the intent of cheating and defrauding divers tradesmen who should bargain with them for the sale to the husband of goods, the property of such tradesmen, of great quantities of such goods, without paying for the same. The wife and daughter were usually together, and on some occasions represented that they were in independent circumstances, having an income derived from the interest of money coming in monthly; and in others the wife had said her husband was in independent circumstances. These statements were made in the absence of the husband; but it was proved that he either occupied the lodgings which were hired under these representations, or that the goods were delivered at the places where all the defendants lodged. Platt, B., is reported to have held that there was no evidence of any conspiracy to represent the husband as a person of considerable property (b). Another count alleged the conspiracy in the same manner as the preceding, but charged the intent to be to defraud persons who should let the husband lodgings for hire, of divers large sums of money, being the sums agreed to be paid for the hire of such lodgings; and Platt, B., is reported to have held that this count was not supported, as well on the ground on which the preceding count was not supported, as because the object of the defendants was to obtain possession of the lodgings, and to deprive the landlord of the use of the rooms, but not to deprive him of the price, which was only incidental to their occupation. They had no object in depriving him of the profits of the rooms, apart from their own occupation of them (c).

Two counts of an indictment charged the defendants with conspiring to obtain from the prosecutor certain bills of exchange accepted by him, and to cheat and defraud him of the proceeds of the said bills; other counts charged a conspiracy to defraud the prosecutor of his monies. Evidence was given to shew the obtaining of the acceptances, but it appeared that the prosecutor had not parted with any money, and there was no reason to suppose that he intended to take up the acceptances, and it was not shewn that the bills which he accepted were ever in his hands, except for the purpose of his writing his acceptances, they having been brought to him complete, except as to his signature. The jury having found the defendants guilty on these counts, a new trial was moved for on the ground that the verdict was unsupported by the evidence, because the charge was of a conspiracy to obtain acceptances from the prosecutor, whereas he proved that the acceptances were ready written, and in possession of the defendants, or some of them, and nothing was sought but his signature. But the Court of Queen's Bench considered that it was only by the signature of the prosecutor that the bills became

(b) R. v. Whitehouse, 6 Cox, 38.

(c) Ibid. 'I was counsel for the Crown in this case, and my recollection of it is that the case went to the jury on all the counts. The main question in the case was whether every representation made was the representation of all. The prisoners came to complete ; and his acceptance when given, being without any consideration, was at the instant his, and in his possession. It was also urged that the entire transaction, as proved by the evidence, was at variance with the indictment, as all parties well knew that the prosecutor had no money, nor could be defrauded of any ; and that the real fraud was on the prosecutor's part, to the prejudice of some expected lender of the sums mentioned in the bills, in return for acceptances of no value. But the court held that, though there might be some ground for this imputation on the prosecutor, yet it would not disprove the fraud practised upon him, by inducing him to accept bills without a corresponding advance of cash. Though there was little appearance of solvency in the prosecutor, those who fraudulently induced him to incur the liability must have speculated on some pecuniary advantage from it ; and though the money could in such case only have come from his respectable friends, as he had no funds of his own, the money intended to be so procured might well be described for this purpose as his money (d).

A. and C. were indicted for conspiring to defraud a railway company by obtaining and selling to others non-transferable excursion tickets. A. had sold the tickets to C. at B., and C. attempted to use them for the purpose of sending some children back to London. It did not appear how A. got the tickets ; he had others in his possession. Wightman, J., left it to the jury to determine whether the prisoners did concert together that the tickets should be obtained and used for the purpose of defrauding the company (e).

On an indictment for conspiracy to cause tinplate-workers to leave their employment, it appeared that the prosecutors, in consequence of their workmen leaving their service, had employed Frenchmen. Erle, J., held that it was not competent to prove how much the firm had lost by these Frenchmen, as the amount of loss by any particular set of workmen was clearly unconnected with the issue whether there was a conspiracy or not ; but that the sum total of the loss might be proved ; for the very issue in the matter was the intention to obstruct the business, and the result of the operations was a relevant fact as to that (f).

Two persons were indicted for felony, in attempting to poison A. B., by administering certain poisonous ingredients, as set forth in the indictment. At the same time, an indictment was found against them for conspiracy to poison the same individual by the same means. On the trial of the first indictment, the prisoners were acquitted, there being no proof that the ingredients were poisonous. Parke, J., thereupon directed an acquittal for the conspiracy also, there being no other proof of a conspiracy to poison than that by which it was attempted to establish the felony, viz., that the ingredients were poisonous (g).

Where an indictment against A., B., C., and D., charged that they conspired together to obtain, ' viz., to the use of them the said A., B., and C., and certain other persons to the jurors unknown,' a sum of money for procuring an appointment under government ; and it appeared that D. when the appointment was procured) did not know that C. was to have any part of it, or was at all implicated in the transaction ; it was held, that the averment concerning the application of the money was material, though coming under a viz., and that as to D., the conspiracy was not proved as laid (h).

Husband and Wife.—On an indictment for conspiracy, the wife of one defendant was held not to be a competent witness for the others, a joint offence being charged, and an acquittal of all the other defendants being a ground of discharge for the husband (i). And, upon an indictment against the wife of W. S. and others for a conspiracy in procuring W. S. to marry, it was held that W. S. was not a competent witness in support of the prosecution (j). The present position of the law as to calling the husband or wife of a defendant as witness against the defendant is considered post, Book XIII. Chapter V., ‘Evidence.’

Trial and Verdict.—Counsel for the Crown is entitled, before opening his case, to have any of the defendants acquitted, without the assent of the other defendants, in order that he may call them as witnesses (k).

In R. v. Kroehl (l), the indictment was against A., B., and C. ; and after the case for the prosecution was closed, C. only called a witness, whom he examined as to a conversation between himself and A. It was ruled, that counsel for the prosecution might cross-examine such witness as to any other conversation between A. and C., although the evidence should tend chiefly to criminate A. (l).

If upon an indictment for conspiracy, the jury find the defendants guilty of so much of the indictment as amounts to a misdemeanor, the Court may pass judgment upon the defendants. The defendants were indicted for conspiring falsely to indict A. B. for keeping a gaming-house, for the purpose of extorting money from A. B., and the jury found the defendants guilty of conspiring to indict A. B., for the purpose of extorting money, but not to indict him falsely ; and it was held that enough of the indictment was found to enable the Court to give judgment ; for, in criminal cases, it is sufficient for the prosecutor to prove so much of the charge as constitutes an offence punishable by law ; and the jury had found the defendants guilty of conspiring to prefer an indictment for the purpose of extorting money, and that is a misdemeanor, whether the charge were or were not false (m).

Before the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. c. 23), post, Vol. ii. p. 2009, it was ruled, that after a conviction for a conspiracy, the defendants must be present in court when a motion was made on their behalf in arrest of judgment (n). It was not a sufficient excuse for absence that they were in custody on civil process ; but if they were in custody on criminal process, the case would be different, for then they might be charged with the conspiracy also (o). But where an indictment had been removed into the Court of King’s Bench, after verdict, but before judgment, it does not appear to have been necessary that the defendants should appear in the Court of King's Bench, the proceeding being in the nature of a special verdict, and the party not being considered as convicted, until after the Court had determined upon the verdict (p). The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, deals with special verdicts and abolishes new trials, but does not deal specifically with motions in arrest of judgment (q).

Where a count contains only one charge of conspiracy against several defendants, the jury cannot find one of them guilty of more than one charge. Where, therefore, a count charged several defendants with conspiring to do several illegal acts, and the jury found one of them guilty of conspiring with some of the defendants to do one of the acts, and guilty of conspiring with others of the defendants to do another of the acts, the finding was held bad ; as it amounted to finding that one defendant was guilty of two conspiracies, though the count charged only one (r). So where a count charged eight defendants with one conspiracy to effect certain objects, a finding that three of the defendants were guilty generally and that five of them were guilty of conspiring to effect some, and not guilty as to the residue of these objects, was held to be bad and repugnant ; for the finding that three were guilty was a finding that they were guilty of conspiracy with the other five to effect all the objects of the conspiracy ; whereas, by the finding as to the five, it appeared that those five were guilty of conspiring to effect only some of those objects (s).

Punishment.—The present (t) punishment for most forms of conspiracy, which are indictable as misdemeanors, is by imprisonment, fine, and sureties for the good behaviour, at the discretion of the Court (u).

By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29, whenever any person shall be convicted of any conspiracy to cheat or defraud, or to extort money or goods, or falsely to accuse of any crime, or to obstruct, prevent, pervert, or defeat the course of public justice, the court may award imprisonment for any term now warranted by law, and hard labour during the whole or any part of such imprisonment. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 4, conspiracies to murder are punishable as statutory felonies.

Where a general verdict is returned on some or all of the counts of an indictment for conspiracy, framed on the same facts, judgment should be entered separately on each count to which it applies, so that if any count is subsequently declared bad the judgment may stand on the good counts (v).

(t) In former times, persons convicted of a conspiracy at the suit of the King to accuse another person of a capital offence, were liable to receive what was called the villainous judgment, used in attainments for crimes of falsity in relation to justice, that is, to lose their liberam legem, whereby they were discredited and disabled as jurors or witnesses ; to forfeit their goods and chattels and lands for life ; to have those lands wasted, their houses razed, their trees rooted up, and their bodies committed to prison. But this judgment was not inflicted upon those who were convicted only of conspiracies of a less aggravated kind, at the suit of the party. 1372, 46 Ass. 11, pl. 307 ; Wright on Conspiracy, 20 ; 1 Hawk. c. 72, s. 9 ; 4 Bl. By 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, s. 3 (ante, p. 178), the punishment is limited in the case of conspiracies to commit offences punishable on summary conviction, to three months' imprisonment or such longer term as could be imposed if the offence had been committed by one person.

C.—SOLICITING OR INCITING TO COMMIT A CRIME.

It has already been shewn (ante c. v.) that where a crime has been committed, those who counselled, procured, or commanded its commission are liable as accessories before the fact in felony, and as principals in misdemeanor. Even where a crime is not in fact committed, those who have unsuccessfully solicited or incited another to commit it are, at common law, guilty of an indictable misdemeanor (whether the crime to which the solicitation or incitement related is either by common law or statute a felony (w) or a misdemeanor), quite distinct from the offences dealt with by the Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861 (ante p. 130) (x). The line between inciting to commit a crime and 'attempting' to commit a crime is not very clearly defined. Where a person was indicted for soliciting a servant to conspire to cheat and defraud his master, and it was proved that such person had offered a bribe to the servant as an inducement to sell his master's goods at less than their value, it was held that he might properly be convicted of inciting (y). And it has been held an indictable misdemeanor to endeavour to provoke another to commit the misdemeanor of sending a challenge to fight a duel (z): and to attempt to incite a lad to commit a felony by sending him a letter which did not reach him (a), or which he did not read (b). The first of these cases is rather of provocation than incitement, and the second treats incitement as a substantive misdemeanor, and an attempt to incite is also a misdemeanor; conversely it would seem to be an offence to incite another to attempt to commit a crime (c). In an old case, attempt to suborn another to commit perjury was held a misdemeanor (d). The offence would now be described as inciting to commit perjury, for the offence of subornation of perjury is not committed unless the perjury itself is committed. From one point of view it may be said that the term attempt applies to a person who tries to commit the crime himself, and the terms solicitation or incitement to the person who tries to get another to commit the crime, who, if the crime were committed, would be an accessory before the fact.

The gist of the offence of incitement here under discussion is that the person incited has not committed the crime to which the incitement

(w) In R. v. Leddington, 9 C. & P. 79, Alderson, B., is reported as having ruled that an indictment did not lie for inciting another to commit suicide: sed quære. See Steph. Dig. Cr. Law (6th ed.), art. 48, and post, pp. 661 et seq.

(d) Anon. before Adams, B., cited in R. v. Scofield, Cald. 400, and R. v. Higgins, 2 East, 14, 17, 22. This is probably the same case as R. v. Edwards, MS. Sum. tit. 'Perjury.'

relates. To solicit a servant to steal, or to conspire with the inciter to steal his master's goods, or to solicit a person to conspire to cheat and defraud, is a misdemeanor, and on an indictment for the solicitation it is not necessary to aver or prove that the servant stole the goods, or entered into the proposed conspiracy to steal them, nor to prove more than the soliciting and inciting (e). In such a case it is left for the defendant to prove that the incitement was merged in the completed offence, whether felony or misdemeanor, and that consequently the indictment does not lie for the incitement, i.e., that the alleged inciter was, in fact, accessory before or at the fact. The question has been raised whether a person can be guilty of inciting another to commit a crime, unless the person incited knows the act intended is a crime (f). Mr. Greaves was of opinion that the guilt of the inciter cannot depend on the state of mind of the incited, and that the state of mind and intention of the inciter, coupled with the act of incitement, that constitute the offence (g). It is well established that a man is liable as a principal who commits a crime through an innocent agent (h). B. may incite A. to do an act which B. knows to be a crime, e.g., to carry away goods which B. does, and A. does not know, belong to C., or to present a cheque which B. knows and A. does not know to be forged. In the view of Sir James Stephen (i), the facts in R. v. Welham indicate that the accused incited H. to carry off corn which H. supposed the accused to have a right to remove, and he considers that the offence was an attempt to commit a felony by an innocent agent, and not an incitement to commit a felony. In a case where incitement to commit a felony (murder) was made a statutory felony, it was held that to warrant conviction for the statutory offence it must be proved that a letter or communication containing the incitement actually reached the person incited, but that in the case of the common-law misdemeanor of incitement it would be enough to shew that the incitement had been posted to the person on whom it was intended to operate (j).

(3) To Commit Statutory Offences.—Code sec. 572.

Indictment not Insufficient for Lack of Detail.—Code sec. 863.

Special provision is made by the Code in respect of “attempted” offences as follows: To take unlawful oath, sec. 130; to influence member of a municipal council, sec. 161(b); to obstruct justice, sec. 180(d); to break prison, sec. 188; to commit sodomy, sec. 203; to procure indecent act with a male person, sec. 206; girl to have unlawful carnal connection with a third party, sec. 216; to carnally know an idiot, sec. 219; to commit murder, sec. 264; to commit suicide, sec. 270; to choke, sec. 276; to cause bodily injuries by explosives, sec. 280; to commit rape, sec. 300; to defile children under fourteen, sec. 301; to commit arson, sec. 512; to set fire to crops, sec. 514; to wreck, sec. 523; to injure or poison cattle, sec. 536.

When the complete commission of the offence charged is not proved, but the evidence establishes an attempt to commit the offence, the accused may be convicted of such attempt and punished accordingly. Code secs. 949 and 951.

When an attempt to commit an offence is charged, but the evidence establishes the commission of the full offence, the accused shall not be entitled to be acquitted, but the jury may convict him of the attempt unless the Court before which such trial is had thinks fit, in its discretion, to discharge the jury from giving any verdict upon such trial, and to direct such person to be indicted for the complete offence.

(2) After a conviction for such attempt, the accused shall not be liable to be tried again for the offence which he was charged with attempting to commit. Code sec. 750.

An indictment, charging that the accused unlawfully attempted to steal from the person of an unknown person the property of such unknown person, without giving the name of the person against whom the offence was committed, or the description of the property the accused attempted to steal, is sufficient. And where a prisoner is indicted for an attempt to steal, and the proof establishes that the offence of larceny was actually committed, the jury may convict of the attempt, unless the Court discharges the jury and directs that the prisoner be indicted for the complete offence (Code sec. 712). R. v. Taylor (1895), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 89 (Que.).

A defendant charged with offering money to a person to swear that A, B and C gave him a certain sum of money to vote for a candidate at an election, was admitted to bail and a recognizance taken by one justice of the peace. It was held that the offence was not an attempt to commit the crime of subornation of perjury, but something less, being an incitement to give false evidence or particular evidence regardless of its truth or falsehood, and was a misdemeanour at common law, and that the recognizance was properly taken by one justice, who had power to admit the accused to bail at common law, and that section 696 of the Code did not apply. R. v. Cole, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 330, 3 O.L.R. 389.

If a person is charged with the commission of an offence and there is not sufficient evidence to convict him of the offence charged, but there is evidence of an attempt to commit the offence notwithstanding that the accused was acquitted, he could not again be put on trial for an attempt to commit the offence for that was included in the charge on which he was tried, and he should have been convicted of the attempt. R. v. Cameron, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 385.

This provision applies to the summary trial of indictable offences, as well as to speedy trials and trials by jury. And when the prisoner consented to be tried summarily upon a charge of pocket picking, he must be taken to have assented to be tried summarily for whatever offence he might properly be found guilty of upon the said charge, and having been properly found guilty upon the said charge of an attempt to commit the offence charged, he must be held to have been legally convicted upon the said trial. R. v. Morgan (No. 1), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 272, 3 O.L.R. 356.

Where on an indictment for a principal offence, and for an attempt to commit such offence, the evidence is wholly directed to the proof of the principal offence, the jury's verdict of guilty of the attempt only will not be set aside, although there were no other witnesses in respect of the attempt than those whose testimony, if wholly believed, shewed the commission of the greater offence. It is within the province of the jury to believe, if it sees fit to do so, a part only of a witness's testimony, and not to believe the remainder of the same witness's testimony, and it may therefore credit the testimony in respect of a greater offence only in so far as it shews a lesser offence, R. v. Hamilton, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 251.

Note.—It is an irrebutable presumption of law that a boy under fourteen is not capable of having carnal knowledge, and therefore cannot be convicted of rape or sodomy. R. v. Allen, 1 Dennison's Cr. Cas. 364; R. v. Hartlen, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 12. Could he be convicted of an attempt to commit either offence, in view of Code sec. 72? The elements of intent and an overt act would be present, and the section says that possibility of accomplishment is not an essential to the commission of the offence. The Imperial Draft Code, 1879, says: "Everyone who, believing that a certain state of facts exists, does or omits an act, the doing or omitting of which would, if that state of facts existed, be an attempt to commit an offence, attempts to commit that offence, although its commission in the manner proposed was, by reason of the non-existence of that state of facts at the time of the act or omission, impossible."

The Imperial Bill of 1880 adopted the language now used in section 72 of the Canadian Code, and in Taschereau's Criminal Code, p. 44, it is said that the section is "somewhat altered in shape and phraseology, but not in substance," from the English Draft Code of 1879, quoted above.

In C. v. Jacobs, 9 Allen (Mass.) 274, it is said that an accused "himself capable of doing every act on his part to accomplish that object cannot protect himself from responsibility by shewing that by reason of some fact unknown to him at the time of his criminal attempt, it could not be carried fully into effect in the particular instance."

The Code of 1879 in enacting that the non-existence of certain facts should not be a defence to the charge of an attempt, deals, apparently, with facts extrinsic to an accused himself capable of completely committing the crime attempted, whereas the incapacity of a minor is a fact, irrebutably presumed, intrinsic to the accused, who under the definition in the Massachusetts case above cited, would not be guilty of an attempt, not being "himself capable."

It is suggested that the language of Code sec. 72 is broader than the words of the section in the Code of 1879, and wide enough to cover even the intrinsic incapacity of the accused, and, therefore, that a boy under fourteen can be convicted of an attempt to commit rape or sodomy.

(b) Conspiracy.

The offence of conspiracy is treated of in the following Code sections:—

Conspiring (a) to do His Majesty Bodily Harm.—Code sec. 74(e).

(b) To Levy War.—Code sec. 74(g).

Conspiring is an Overt Act.—Code sec. 75.

Intention (a) to Depose the King.

(b) To Levy War.

(c) To Induce Invasion, Manifested by Conspiring with any Person, is a Treasonable Offence, Punishable by Imprisonment for Life.—Code sec. 78.

Conspiracy to Intimidate a Legislature.—Code sec. 79.

Conspiracy to bring about a change in the government by bribing members of the Legislature to vote against the government is an indictable offence as a common law misdemeanour. The fact that the Legislature has power by statute to punish as for a contempt does not oust the jurisdiction of the Courts where the offence is of a criminal character; the same act may be in one aspect a contempt of the Legislature and in another aspect an indictable offence. R. v. Bunting, 7 Ont. R. 524.

Seditious Conspiracy, Definition of.—Code secs. 132, 134.

Conspiracy to bring False Accusation.—Code sec. 178.

To Induce a Woman to Commit Adultery.—Code sec. 218.

To Murder.—Code sec. 266.

To Commit Indictable Offence.—Code sec. 573.

Conspiracy to Defraud.—See Code sec. 444.

A conspiracy to defraud is indictable, although the conspirators have been unsuccessful in carrying out the fraud. R. v. Frawley, 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 253.

A conspiracy to defraud is indictable, although the object was to commit civil wrong, and although if carried out the act agreed upon would not constitute a crime. R. v. Defries, 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 207.

The doctrines of commercial agency do not apply to prevent the operation of the criminal law. So where one Clark, a policyholder of a fire insurance company, conspired with Howse, their local agent, to defraud the company, and handed to Howse for transmission to the company an unfounded proof of claim for pretended losses for fire, and obtained the money through Howse from the company, it was held that the knowledge of Howse of the falsity of the pretence could not be imputed as the knowledge of the company so as to affect the criminality of Clark. R. v. Clark, 2 B.C.R. 191.

Upon a charge of conspiracy to defraud the Canadian Pacific Railway by bribing clerks in the company's employ, to illegally and fraudulently disclose information of the secret audits of trains to be made, and to furnish such information to the conductors to enable them to be prepared for the audits when made, and at other times to be free to retain fares and to allow passengers to ride free or at a reduced fare, the Court properly rejected evidence of conductors to the effect that if they knew the date of a proposed secret audit, they would communicate it to the conductor whose train was to be audited for a purpose other than that of defrauding the company. R. v. Carlin (No. 2), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 507.

An indictment for conspiracy to defraud may properly charge that the conspiracy was with persons unknown, if neither the Crown nor the private prosecutor had definite information of the identity of the alleged co-conspirators. Where at the trial of such an indictment the name of one of the alleged co-conspirators is for the first time disclosed in the testimony of a Crown witness, that information may then be added to the statement of particulars of the indictment. R. v. Johnston, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 232.

In an indictment charging a conspiracy to defraud it is not necessary to set out overt acts done in pursuance of the illegal agreement or conspiracy, nor is it necessary to name the person defrauded or intended to be defrauded. Before the acts of alleged conspiracy can be given in evidence there ought to be some preliminary proof to shew an acting together, but it is not necessary that a conspiracy should first be proved. R. v. Hutchinson, 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 486, 11 B.C.R. 24.

The offence of conspiracy to defraud under Code sec. 444 does not include a conspiracy to defeat a candidate's chances of election by the employment of unlawful devices. A charge of conspiracy the particulars of which severally allege that the accused conspired to defraud a candidate at an election to the Saskatchewan Legislature, the electors of the division and the public, by illegally obtaining the return of the opposing candidate, does not disclose an offence under sec. 573 of the Code, for the acts alleged as the object of the conspiracy do not constitute an indictable offence either by statute or at common law. R. v. Sinclair, 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 20.

Extradition.—Conspiracy to defraud is in itself not an extraditable offence between Canada and the United States, but extradition will lie as for a separate crime in respect of an overt act of a conspiracy which constitutes one of the crimes mentioned in the extradition arrangement. And the extraditable offence of larceny or participation in larceny is charged sufficiently in an information laid on instituting extradition proceedings therefor, if, following a charge of conspiracy to defraud between the accused and another person and an embezzlement and theft by such other person in pursuance thereof, the information alleges that the accused "did participate in the said offence of embezzlement and theft." United States v. Gaynor; Re Gaynor and Greene (No. 3), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 205 (P.C.).

Conspiracy in Restraint of Trade.—Code secs. 496, 497, 498, 581.

Trade Union.—The Trade Unions Act, R.S.C., 1906, ch. 125, defines the expression "trade union" to mean (unless the context otherwise requires) such combination whether temporary or permanent for regulating the relations between workmen and masters or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business as would, but for that statute, have been deemed to be an unlawful combination by reason of some one or more of its purposes being in restraint of trade. R.S.C. 1906, ch. 125, sec. 2; and see Code sec. 6.

Undue Limitation and Unreasonable Enhancement.—The prevention of every enhancement of prices or every lessening of competition in the purchase, barter or sale of commodities was not intended to be included in sub-sec. (b), of sec. 498, for where enhancing, preventing or lessening is specifically referred to it is qualified by the word “unreasonably” or “unduly.” Sub-sec. (b) cannot well have been intended to embrace every combination to prevent or restrain particular kinds of systems of trading or particular kinds of bargains. At most, it includes only combinations for the direct purpose of preventing or materially reducing trade or commerce in a general sense with reference to a commodity or certain commodities, or for purposes designed or likely to produce that effect. Gibbins v. Metcalfe (1905), 15 Man. R. 583.

Sub-section (b) of sec. 498, originated with the Code Amendment of 1900. It applies not only to regularly organized trade unions, as that term is defined by the Trade Union Act, R.S.C. ch. 125, but to any voluntary organization of labourers. Senate Debates, 1900, page 1044. As to trade unions there is a provision in R.S.C. ch. 125, as follows: (Sec. 2): “The purposes of any trade union shall not by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful so as to render any member of such trade union liable to criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise, or so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust.”

1. The definition of a trade combination or conspiracy in Code sec. 496 applies to sub-sec. (b) of sec. 498, not to sub-secs. (a), (c) and (d) thereof which in themselves define the classes of offence to which they relate.

2. A conviction on indictment for conspiring with certain persons named and others unknown “or with some or one of them” is not invalid for uncertainty, the names of the persons being in the nature of particulars only and not material to the constitution of the offence.

3. Where a defendant is arraigned and tried alone upon a charge of conspiracy he may be convicted and sentenced without first proceeding with the trial of the co-conspirators.

4. On an appeal both on the facts and the law under Code sec. 1012 in a trade combine case tried without a jury, the Court of Appeal is to decide whether the judgment below should have been for the accused or whether there was evidence on which the judgment against him could be reasonably supported. R. v. Clarke (No. 2), 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 57.

A lock-out agreement made by an employers' association following a demand from the employees' trade union for an increase in wages, is not a contravention of sec. 498 of the Code, as to trade combinations, although the contracting parties thereby agree to discharge from their employ all members of the employees' union, and not to re-employ them on a higher scale of wages than the rate prevailing at the date of the agreement.

2. On proof of damage to the signatories of the agreement through breach of the conditions, a civil action lies upon the promissory note given by the defaulting subscriber to trustees for the association to ensure the carrying out of such agreement. Lefebvre v. Knott, 13 Can. Cr. Cas. 223.

The offence of conspiring to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the sale or supply of an article of commerce under Cr. Code sec. 498(d) may exist without regard to the question whether the effect of the combine has been to raise or lower prices.

Such a charge as regards the lumber trade is supported by evidence that a trade association for whose actions the defendant was responsible assumed to fix a regular price of lumber in the various localities in which their members traded and to prevent persons from engaging in the lumber trade in those localities except with the consent and approval of the association through its officers and subject to its control both as to the minimum prices to be charged the public and as to the places in which new lumber yards should be started. The King v. Clarke (No. 1), 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 46.

Indictment for Conspiracy.—Code secs. 859, 860, 863.

An indictment for conspiracy to defraud is valid without setting out any overt acts and the name of the person injured or intended to be injured need not be stated therein. R. v. Hutchinson (1904), 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 486 (B.C.).

In a case of conspiracy to do that which is not a crime or to do a wrong which is not well known as being the subject of a criminal conspiracy, the facts should be set out in the indictment that it may appear whether or not the conspiracy charged is an indictable offence. An indictment for conspiracy to cure another of a sickness endangering life, "by unlawful and improper means" and thereby causing his death is bad and should be quashed because it does not specify the unlawful and improper means nor indicate the specific crime or wrong intended to be relied upon. R. v. Goodfellow (1906), 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 424, 11 O.L.R. 359.

Particulars furnished under sec. 859 of the Code have not the effect of amending or extending the scope of the original indictment or charge, and the inclusion of a separate and distinct offence as a particular under a charge of conspiracy will not authorize a conviction which would otherwise not be within the scope of the indictment. R. v. Sinclair (1906), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 20 (Sask.).

Any overt act of conspiracy is to be viewed as a renewal or continuation of the original agreement made by all of the conspirators, and if done in another jurisdiction than that in which the original concerted purpose was formed, jurisdiction will then attach to authorize a trial of the charge in such other jurisdiction. R. v. Connolly, 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 468.

It is not necessary to prove that the defendants actually met together and concerted the proceeding; it is sufficient if the jury are satisfied from the defendants' conduct, either together or severally, that they were acting in concert. R. v. Fellowes, 19 U.C.Q.B. 48, 58. Farquhar v. Robertson, 13 Ont. P.R. 156.

The jury may group the detached acts of the parties severally, and view them as indicating a concerted purpose on the part of all as proof of the alleged conspiracy. R. v. Connolly, 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 468.

When the existence of the common design on the part of the defendants has been proved, then evidence is properly receivable as against all of what was said or done by either in furtherance in the common design. Ibid.

Limitation of Prosecution.—Code sec. 1141, which limits certain proceedings for penalties and forfeitures to two years after the offence, does not apply to bar a prosecution where the offence was a continuing one, the association remaining in active operation under the presidency of the defendant up to the commencement of the prosecution. The King v. Elliott, 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 505, 9 O.L.R. 648.

Inciting to Commit Crime.—Counselling a woman in Canada to submit in a foreign country to an operation to procure her miscarriage the submission to which in Canada would be an indictable offence is not, in itself, indictable in Canada, if the operation is performed in a foreign country. R. v. Walkem, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 122.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

OF PUNISHMENTS.

SECT. I.—DEATH.

WHEN the first edition of this work was published, high treason, piracy, and a very large number of felonies were punishable by death (a). In fact, at common law, and by the legislation prior to 1820, the usual sentence of the law on a conviction for felony was death by hanging. To this rule there were only two exceptions at common law, mayhem, and larceny of money or chattels of a value not exceeding 12*d.*—an exception dating back to Saxon times (b). The number of offences for which capital punishment can now be awarded has, by piecemeal legislation between 1808 and 1861 (c), been reduced to four—high treason (d), felonies against the Dockyards Protection Act, 1772 (12 Geo. III. c. 24), piracy accompanied by violence (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 88), s. 2, and wilful murder (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 2).

By the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), s. 103, ‘sentence of death shall not be pronounced on or recorded against a child (e) or young person (f), but in lieu thereof the Court shall sentence the child or young person to be detained during His Majesty’s pleasure, and if so sentenced he shall, notwithstanding anything in the other provisions of this Act, be detained in such place and under such conditions as the Secretary of State may direct, and whilst so detained shall be deemed to be in legal custody’ (g).

The severity of the old law was mitigated by the privileges of benefit of clergy (h). During the nineteenth century, the policy of the legislature was (a) The number is said to have been about 180 in 1819; Walpole, Hist. Eng. i. 191, ii. 58; Steph. Hist. Cr. L. i. 470.

(b) ‘The King has also ordained that no one should be slain for less property than xii. pence worth, unless he should flee or defend himself.’ Judicia civitatis Londoniæ, temp. Athelstan; Ancient Laws, &c., of England, ff. 97, 103.

(c) Given in some detail in Steph. Hist. Cr. L. vol. i. pp. 472–475. See Report of Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, Parl. Pap. 1866.

(d) Outside the scope of this work. See Arch. Cr. Pl. (23rd ed.), tit. ‘Treason.’

(e) i.e. a person of seven and under fourteen. 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 131.

(f) i.e. a person of fourteen and under sixteen. 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 131.

(g) By another Bill introduced in 1908 it was proposed to limit the death sentence to murder in the first degree, i.e. with express malice aforethought, and to make the killing by a mother of a child under one month no longer murder, and by an amendment to the Children Act, 1908, moved by the Lord Chancellor but rejected, it was proposed to empower the Court to substitute penal servitude or other punishment in the case of conviction of a mother for murdering her infant under one year of age.

(h) Benefit of clergy was the claim of persons in holy orders to exemption from the jurisdiction of lay tribunals. The claim was by degrees extended to all persons who could read, and ultimately to all persons (6 Anne, c. 9). The test of capacity to read was by requiring the claimant to read the ‘neck verse’ (Ps. li. 1). The claim could be made only on a first conviction unless a certificate of ordination was produced (28 Hen. VIII. c. 1; 1 Edw. VI. c. 12). The claim, if established, exempted from capital punishment continuous in reducing the number of crimes for which the sentence of death could be imposed ; and with the alleviation of the extreme severity of the law, benefit of clergy was abolished (as anomalous and as an anachronism) by sect. 6 of the Criminal Law Act, 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28), and by sect. 7 of the same Act it is provided that ' no person convicted of felony shall suffer death unless it be for some felony which was excluded from the benefit of clergy before or on the first day of the present session of Parliament (November 14, 1826), or which hath been or shall be made punishable with death by some statute passed after that day ' (i).

By a series of Acts passed in 1837, the punishment of death was abolished as to a number of other felonies. The Forgery Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 84) (j), s. 1 substitutes transportation (k) for life as the maximum punishment for forgeries within a series of enactments relating to that offence (l). The Piracy Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 88), s. 3 makes the like provisions as to all offences in the nature of piracy (m) except piracy with violence mentioned (ante, p. 205). 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 91, s. 1, does the like as to felonious riot, and inciting to mutiny and unlawful oaths, and offences under sect. 9 of the Slave Trade Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 113). The penalty of death retained by other Acts of the year, 1837, as to administering poison (c. 85, s. 2), and burglary with violence (c. 86, s. 2), and robbery with wounding (c. 87, s. 2), and setting fire to dwelling-houses, any person being therein, or to ships, and hanging out false signals (c. 89, ss. 2, 4, 5), was abolished as to these offences in 1861 (n).

Recording Sentence of Death.—The Judgment of Death Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 48), after reciting that 'it is expedient that in all cases of felony not within the benefit of clergy, except murder, the court before which the offender or offenders shall be convicted shall be authorised to abstain from pronouncing judgment of death, whenever such court shall be of opinion that under the particular circumstances of any case, the offender or offenders is or are a fit and proper subject or fit and proper subjects to be recommended on a first conviction. Benefit of clergy was abolished in 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6), as to commons and clergy, and as to peers in 1841 (4 & 5 Vict. c. 22). Before that date benefit of clergy had as to many felonies been taken away by statute. See 1 Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law, 424—440. 2 Pike Hist. Cr. 452. 1 Steph. Hist. Cr. L. 460.

(i) Like provision is made as to Ireland by 9 Geo. IV. c. 54, s. 13.

(j) This Act was repealed in 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 39) as to the punishment of offences formerly punishable under the Acts 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Will. IV. c. 66 ; 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 45, or 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 51, and (except as to Scotland) as relates to the punishment of offences formerly punishable under 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 123, or 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 44. S. 2 was repealed in 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 67), s. 3 in 1893 (S. L. R. No. 2), and s. 4 in 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 51). These repeals do not revive the former law ; vide ante, p. 5.

(k) Now penal servitude, see post, p. 210.

(l) 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Will. IV. c. 66 ; 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 59, s. 19 ; 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 123 ; 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 125, s. 64 ; 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 45, s. 12 ; 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 51, s. 5. All the recited Acts were repealed in 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 84), or 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 95).

(m) Under 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15 ; 11 Will. III. c. 7 ; 4 Geo. IV. c. 11 ; 8 Geo. I. c. 24 ; 18 Geo. II. c. 30. See 'Piracy,' post, p. 255.

(n) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95. By 1839 only fourteen felonies were capitally punishable. 4th Rep. Crim. Law Commrs. App. X. The number was further reduced in 1861 to those stated ante, p. 205.

(o) This Act was passed on July 8, 1823. The preamble has been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act (No. 2, 1890). It is said that this Act was passed to avoid the necessity of presenting to King George IV. the report of the Recorder of London at the conclusion of each session of the Old Bailey, shall be convicted of any felony, except murder, and shall by law be excluded the benefit of clergy (p) in respect thereof, and the court before which such offender shall be convicted shall be of opinion that, under the particular circumstances of the case, such offender is a fit and proper subject to be recommended for the royal mercy, it shall and may be lawful for such court, if it shall think fit so to do, to direct the proper officer then being present in court to require and ask, whereupon such officer shall require and ask, if such offender hath or knoweth anything to say, why judgment of death should not be recorded against such offender; and in case such offender shall not allege any matter or thing sufficient in law to arrest or bar such judgment, the court shall and may and is hereby authorised to abstain from pronouncing judgment of death upon such offender, and, instead of pronouncing such judgment, to order the same to be entered of record; and thereupon such proper officer as aforesaid shall and may and is hereby authorised to enter judgment of death on record against such offender, in the usual and accustomed form, and in such and the same manner as is now used, and as if judgment of death had actually been pronounced in open court against such offender by the court before which such offender shall have been convicted.'

By sect. 2. 'A record of every such judgment, so entered as aforesaid, shall have the like effect to all intents and purposes, and be followed by all the same consequences, as if such judgment had actually been pronounced in open court, and the offender had been reprieved by the court' (pp). The Act was applied to the Central Criminal Court in 1837 (q).

The exception of murder from the Act of 1823 was removed in 1836 (r). But by sect. 2 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), 'upon every conviction for murder the court shall pronounce sentence of death' (rr).

The mode of executing a sentence of death for murder is prescribed by sects. 2, 3 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, and by the Capital Punishment Amendment Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 24), and rules made thereunder (s).

The Act of 1868 applies only to murder (sect. 2), and there are no statutory provisions as to executing a sentence of death for other capital felonies.

Denman, the Recorder, having been counsel for Queen Caroline on her trial. The report was abolished in 1837 (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 77, s. 1). Denman was Common Serjeant only in 1829, but a difficulty did then arise about his attending the King in the place of the Recorder. See Greville, Memoirs, vol. i. pp. 156, 246, 250.

SECT. II.—EXILE, BANISHMENT, AND EXPULSION.

At common law sentence of banishment or exile could not be imposed on a British subject by any Court (t). The nearest approach to it was abjuration of the realm (u) by persons who had taken sanctuary.

By the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, 1829 (10 Geo. IV. c. 7), s. 34, power is given to sentence to banishment from the United Kingdom for the term of their natural life persons who within the United Kingdom become Jesuits or brothers or members of any other male religious order, community, or society of the Church of Rome, and by sects. 35, 36, provisions are made for enforcing the sentence and for punishing by transportation for life persons found at large in the United Kingdom after the end of three months from the sentence of banishment. These provisions, though unrepealed, have never been put into force (v).

By sect. 15 of the Penal Servitude Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99), it is declared that transportation shall include banishment beyond the seas, and by that Act the power to impose sentences of transportation was limited to terms of fourteen years or upwards. By the Penal Servitude Act, 1857 (w), transportation as the sentence of a court was abolished.

At the present time (1909), the banishment of a British subject is effected only by means of terms imposed in granting a conditional pardon: and the course of legislation in the United States and British possessions has made it inexpedient to include such terms in pardons.

Expulsion of Aliens.—The right to exclude or expel aliens is by the law of nations vested in the supreme power of every state, which, as a necessary consequence has power to make and enforce laws for those purposes (x).

In the case of aliens, the Aliens Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII. c. 13), enacts :

Sect. 1. 'The Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, make an order (in this Act referred to as an expulsion order) requiring an alien to leave the United Kingdom within a time fixed by the order, and thereafter to remain out of the United Kingdom—

- (a) if it is certified to him by any court (including a court of summary jurisdiction) that the alien has been convicted by that court of any felony, or misdemeanor, or other offence for which the court has power to impose imprisonment without the option of a fine, or of an offence under paragraph twenty-two or twenty-three of section three hundred and eighty-one of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 55), or of an offence as a prostitute under section seventy-two of the Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 103), or paragraph eleven of section fifty-four

- (b) if it is certified to him by a court of summary jurisdiction after proceedings taken for the purpose within twelve months after the alien has last entered the United Kingdom, in accordance with rules of court made under section twenty-nine of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), that the alien—
- (i) has, within three months from the time at which proceedings for the certificate are commenced, been in receipt of any such parochial relief as disqualifies a person for the parliamentary franchise, or been found wandering without ostensible means of subsistence, or been living under insanitary conditions due to over-crowding; or
- (ii) has entered the United Kingdom after the passing of this Act, and has been sentenced (y) in a foreign country with which there is an extradition treaty for a crime not being an offence of a political character, which is, as respects that country, an extradition crime within the meaning of the Extradition Act, 1870 (z).
- (2) If any alien in whose case an expulsion order has been made is at any time found within the United Kingdom in contravention of the order, he shall be guilty of an offence under this Act' (a).
- Sect. 4.—(1) 'Where an expulsion order is made in the case of any alien, the Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, pay the whole or any part of the expenses of or incidental to the departure from the United Kingdom, and maintenance until departure, of the alien and his dependants (if any) . . .' (b).

SECT. III.—TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE.

The punishment of transportation, first devised as a statutory punishment temp. Elizabeth (c), was also used by way of conditional pardon without statutory authority in respect of many crimes (d). In the eighteenth century it became a statutory punishment for many felonies (e),

(y) It is not stated whether this includes a conviction par contumace followed by a sentence passed in absentia.

(b) In cases specified in subs. 2 of this section the master of the ship by which the alien arrived is liable to recoup the expenses of expulsion, or to reconvey the alien and his dependents to the port of embarkation.

(c) 39 Eliz. c. 4 (rep.), which enacted that rogues, vagabonds, &c., might, by the justices in sessions, be banished out of the realm, and conveyed at the charges of the county to such parts beyond the seas as should be assigned by the privy council, or otherwise adjudged perpetually to the galleys of this realm; and any rogue so banished, and returning again into the realm, was to be guilty of felony. and some misdemeanors, e.g., perjury (f). The earlier legislation was repealed and consolidated with amendments in the Transportation Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV., c. 84). Owing to difficulties which arose as to inducing the Australian Colonies (g) to accept transported convicts and in finding other places for transportation, certain prisons in England were substituted, in 1847, for the penal settlements in the colonies (10 & 11 Vict. c. 67), and in 1853 sentences of transportation for less than fourteen years were abolished (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99, s. 1). Penal servitude was substituted for terms of transportation under fourteen years (sect. 2), and the Courts were given a discretion to substitute penal servitude under the Act for transportation for terms of fourteen years or over, (sect. 3). The legislation applicable to persons under sentence of transportation was so far as consistent with the Act of 1853, applied to sentences of penal servitude (sect. 7).

In 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 3), transportation under the sentence of a Court was abolished (h), and penal servitude definitely substituted. Certain portions of the Act of 1824 are specifically retained and applied to persons sentenced to penal servitude (i).

By the Penal Servitude Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99), penal servitude was introduced in lieu of transportation in certain cases and under certain regulations (j), without affecting the power to impose alternative punishments (s. 14).

The alterations do not affect the prerogative of mercy, but the Crown may grant pardons conditional on serving a term of penal servitude (sects. 5, 13). The substitution of penal servitude for transportation does not affect the power of Courts to impose other punishments additional to, or in substitution for transportation (sect. 14). By the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), s. 102, a child of seven and under fourteen, and a young person of fourteen and under sixteen, may not be sentenced to penal servitude.

By sect. 6 of the Act of 1853, 'every person who under this Act shall be sentenced or ordered to be kept in penal servitude may, during the term of the sentence or order, be confined in any such prison or place of confinement in any part of the United Kingdom, or in any river, port, or harbour of the United Kingdom, in which persons under sentence or order of transportation, may now by law be confined, or in any other prison in the United Kingdom, or in any part of His Majesty's dominions beyond the seas, or in any port or harbour thereof, as one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state may from time to time direct; and such person may during such term be kept to hard labour, and otherwise dealt with in all respects as persons sentenced to transportation may now by law be dealt with while so confined' (k).

is to be read as one Act with the Act of 1853 (l), 'after the commencement of this Act (June 26, 1857), no person shall be sentenced to transportation; and any person who, if this Act and the said Act [of 1853] had not been passed, might have been sentenced to transportation, shall be liable to be sentenced to be kept in penal servitude for a term of the same duration as the term of transportation to which such person would have been liable if the said Act and this Act had not been passed; and in every case where at the discretion of the Court one of any two or more terms of transportation might have been awarded, the Court shall have the like discretion to award one of any two or more of the terms of penal servitude which are hereby authorised to be awarded instead of such terms of transportation' . . . (m).

By sect. 6, 'Where in any enactment now in force the expression 'any crime punishable with transportation,' or 'any crime punishable by law with transportation,' or any expression of the like import, is used, the enactment shall be construed and take effect as applicable also to any crime punishable with penal servitude.'

By the Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69), s. 1: '(1) Where under any enactment in force when this section comes into operation (August 5, 1891) a court has power to award a sentence of penal servitude, the sentence may, at the discretion of the court, be for any period not less than three years, and not exceeding either five years, or any greater period authorised by the enactment' (n).

'(3) Sect. 2 of the Penal Servitude Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 47) is hereby repealed with respect to any sentence awarded after the date at which this section comes into operation' (o).

Under most of the sections of the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861 the minimum term of penal servitude was three years.

The mode in which sentences of penal servitude are to be carried out is regulated by prison rules, in which regard must be had to the sex, age, health, industry, and conduct of the convicts (p).

SECT. IV.—IMPRISONMENT.

Without Hard Labour.—Imprisonment without hard labour is recognised by the common law as one of the lawful modes of punishing (l) 16 & 17 Vict. c. 99. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 7.

(m) The rest of this section was repealed in 1892 (S. L. R.), as to all His Majesty's dominions. Ss. 3, 4 of the Act of 1857 apply the Transportation Acts to persons under sentence of penal servitude imposed in England or Ireland vide post, pp. 573 et seq.

(n) See R. v. Peters 1 Cr. App. R. 141 as to the effect of this Act and Statute Law revision repeals on the maximum sentence of penal servitude. For subsec. 2 see post, p. 212. At one time the opinion prevailed that for certain offences fixed terms of transportation or imprisonment should be imposed. This policy was overridden in 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 24, rep. 1892, S. L. R.) as to certain cases of felony. In the Acts of 1861 a minimum term of penal servitude was prescribed for only one offence (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61), which minimum has been reduced to three years by the Act of 1891.

(o) The repealed section made the minimum term of penal servitude seven years in the case of conviction on indictment of a crime or offence punishable by penal servitude after a previous conviction of felony. For decisions thereon see R. v. Deane, 2 Q.B.D. 305. R. v. Willis, 41 L. J. M. C. 104. R. v. Summers, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 182. S. 2 had already been repealed in 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 55, s. 1) as to the minimum term of penal servitude on a conviction of an offence punishable by penal servitude after a previous conviction of felony.

(p) 61 & 62 Vict. c. 41, s. 4: Convict Prison Rules, 1899 (St. R. & O., 1899, No. 320).

misdeameanors. Successive terms of imprisonment may be imposed in respect of several convictions at the same time for similar misdeameanors(g).

There are now two forms of imprisonment—with and without hard labour(qq). A child of seven and under fourteen may not be sentenced to imprisonment (8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 102 (1)) and a young person (of fourteen and under sixteen) may not be sentenced to imprisonment for an offence or committed to prison in default of payment of a fine, damages, or costs, unless the Court certifies that he is too unruly or too depraved for detention as a youthful offender (sect. 102 (3)).

By the Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69), s. 1 (2), “Where under any Act now (August 5, 1891) in force, or under any future Act, a court is empowered or required to award a sentence of penal servitude, the court may, in its discretion, unless such future Act otherwise requires, award imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour’ (r). This enactment applies to all felonies not punishable by death(rr), and to certain misdeameanors, e.g., perjury and obtaining by false pretences, for which penal servitude may be imposed. (Vide post, Book VII. Chapter I., Book X. Chapter XXVII.)

Hard Labour.—A sentence to imprisonment with hard labour(s) is never obligatory upon any Court, and cannot lawfully be imposed except under statutory authority. The more general statutory provisions on the subject are that above stated, and the two enactments now to be noticed(t).

By the Hard Labour Act, 1822 (3 Geo. IV. c. 114), after reciting 53 Geo. III. c. 162, it is enacted, that ‘whenever any person shall be convicted of any of the offences hereafter specified and set forth, that is to say . . . any attempt to commit felony; any riot; . . . keeping a common gaming-house, a common bawdy-house, or a common ill-governed and disorderly house; wilful and corrupt perjury, or of subornation of perjury; . . . in each and every of the above cases, and whenever any person shall be convicted of any or either of the aforesaid offences, it shall and may be lawful for the court before which any such offender shall be convicted, or which by law is authorised to pass sentence upon any such offender, to award and order (if such court shall think fit) sentence of imprisonment with hard labour for any term not exceeding the term for which such court may now imprison for such offences, either in addition to or in lieu of any other punishment which may be inflicted on any such offenders by any law in force before the passing of this Act; and every such offender shall thereupon suffer such sentence, in such place, and for such time as aforesaid, as such court shall think fit to direct’ (u).

(r) This enactment superseded all statutory provisions allowing imprisonment as an alternative to transportation or penal servitude, and most of such provisions have now been repealed by Statute Law Revision Acts of 1892 and 1893. In particular, 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 9, and 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 84, s. 3, printed in the 6th ed. of this work, vol. i. pp. 65, 82, are so repealed. (rr) Vide post, p. 246.

(s) The mode in which a sentence of hard labour is to be carried out is determined by Prison Rules made under s. 4 of the Prison Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 41), and varies according to the age and sex of the prisoner. In the case of males between sixteen and twenty-four, special rules have been made. 1902, June 5; 1906, July 13.

(t) For the special provisions of particular statutes authorising imprisonment with hard labour see the title relating to the offence.

(u) The omitted portions of this enactment have been superseded and repealed by other legislation and the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861.

By the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 100), s. 29, 'whenever any person shall be convicted of any one of the offences following, as an indictable misdemeanor; that is to say, any cheat or fraud punishable at common law; any conspiracy to cheat or defraud, or to extort money or goods, or falsely to accuse of any crime, or to obstruct, prevent, pervert, or defeat the course of public justice; any escape or rescue from lawful custody on a criminal charge; any public and indecent exposure of the person . . . (v); any public selling, or exposing for public sale or to public view of any obscene book, print, picture, or other indecent exhibition; it shall be lawful for the court to sentence the offender to be imprisoned for any term now warranted by law, and also to be kept to hard labour during the whole or any part of such term of imprisonment.'

By the Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 94), s. 4 (w), 'Every accessory after the fact to any felony, except where it is otherwise specially enacted (x), whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any Act passed or to be passed, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction (y), for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' . . . (z).

By the Prison Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 21), s. 40, 'The Prison Commissioners shall see that any prisoner under sentence, inflicted upon conviction of sedition or seditious libel, shall be treated as a misdemeanant of the first division within the meaning of sect. 67 of the Prison Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 126), notwithstanding any statute, provision, or rule, to the contrary.' By sect. 41. 'Any person who shall be imprisoned under any rule, order, or attachment for contempt of any court shall be in like manner treated as a misdemeanant of the first division, within the meaning of the said section of the said Act' (zz).

By the Prison Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 41), s. 6, (1) 'Prisoners convicted of offences, either on indictment or otherwise, and not sentenced to penal servitude or hard labour, shall be divided into three divisions.'

(2) 'Where a person is convicted by any court of an offence and is sentenced to imprisonment without hard labour, the court may, if it thinks fit, having regard to the nature of the offence and the antecedents of the offender, direct that he be treated as an offender of the first division or as an offender of the second division. If no direction is given by the court, the offender shall, subject to the provisions of this section, be treated as an offender of the third division' (a).

(4) 'Any person imprisoned for default of entering into a recognisance, or finding sureties for keeping the peace or for being of good behaviour,

(v) The words here omitted were repealed in 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, s. 1).

(z) Similar provisions are made in 24 & 25

Vict. c. 96, s. 98; c. 97, s. 56; c. 98, s. 49; c. 99, s. 35; c. 100, s. 67.

shall be treated under the same rules as an offender of the second division, unless he is a convicted prisoner, or unless the court direct that he be treated as an offender of the first division.'

(5) 'References in sects. 40, 41, of the Prison Act, 1877 (b), to a misdemeanant of the first division within the meaning of sect. 67 of the Prison Act, 1865 (c), shall be construed as references to an offender of the first division within the meaning of this section.'

Criminal Courts have not, in the opinion of the Secretary of State (d), sufficiently kept in mind the power given to them to classify persons sentenced to imprisonment without hard labour given by the enactment above stated, nor the terms of the Prison Rules applicable to the three divisions created by the enactment. It would seem that cases for directing the offender to be put in the first division are not of common occurrence, and that the reasons for placing an offender in the second division are not so much the legal character of the offence (except in cases where the imprisonment is ordered in default of paying a fine), but the character and antecedents of the prisoner and the circumstances under which the offence was committed, e.g., where the prisoner does not belong to the criminal class and has not been generally of criminal habits, and there is evidence of good character over a considerable period, and it is clear that exceptional temptation or special provocation has led to a merely temporary deviation from the path of honesty or to an act of violence not in consonance with the natural disposition of the prisoner (e). The state of the prisoner's health appears to be no sufficient reason for placing him in the second division, because under the prison administration prisoners of whatever class are excused from discipline to which their state of health unfits them.

The mode in which sentences of imprisonment, with or without hard labour, are to be carried out in prisons is regulated by prison rules, in which regard is had to the sex, age, health, industry and conduct of the prisoners (f), and the rules provide for enabling a prisoner sentenced to imprisonment, whether by one sentence or a cumulative sentence, for a period prescribed by the rules (g), to earn by special industry and good conduct a remission of a portion of his imprisonment, and on his discharge (in virtue of such remission) his sentence shall be deemed to have expired (h).

In any sentence of imprisonment passed on or since January 1, 1899, month means calendar month unless a contrary intention is expressed by the Court; and a prisoner whose term of imprisonment expires on Sunday, Christmas Day, or Good Friday, is to be discharged on the next preceding day (i).

Solitary Confinement.—Under many statutes passed between 1827 and 1862, power was given to sentence a prisoner to solitary confinement.

(c) S. 67 is repealed by 61 & 62 Vict. c. 41, s. 15 (2), as from May 1, 1899, the date when the first Prison Rules made under 61 & 62 Vict. c. 41, s. 2 came into force. Prison Rules, 1899 (St. R. & O. 1899, No. 322).

Most, if not all, these enactments were repealed in 1893 (j), having fallen out of use in consequence of the provisions of the Prison Acts and Rules (k), under which solitary confinement is a matter of prison regulation and not of judicial sentence.

SECT. V.—WHIPPING.

Whipping in public or in private was recognised by the common law as an appropriate mode of punishing misdemeanants of either sex (l), and in a few cases was made a statutory punishment for felony or misdemeanor (ll).

Females.—The whipping of females is absolutely forbidden by 1 Geo. IV. c. 57, s. 1, and imprisonment with hard labour for not less than one month nor more than six months is substituted for the punishment of whipping in cases in which, prior to July 15, 1820, the punishment of whipping had formed the whole or part of the judgment or sentence on a female offender (sect. 2).

Adult Males.—At the present time the whipping of adult males is authorised (i) by the Knackers Act, 1786 (26 Geo. III. c. 71), ss. 8, 9; (ii) by the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 83), in the case of men sent to quarter sessions to be dealt with as incorrigible rogues (m); (iii) by the Garrotters Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 44), in the case of offences within sect. 43 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and sect. 21 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861; (iv) in the case of males under sentence of penal servitude, or convicted of felony, or sentenced to hard labour, who are guilty of mutiny or incitement to mutiny, or of gross personal violence to an officer or servant of the prison in which they are (n).

Youthful Males.—In the case of taking a reward for helping to the discovery of stolen property, whipping can be inflicted on a male offender who is under the age of eighteen (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 101). In many other cases (o) this punishment can be inflicted on male offenders under the age of sixteen, e.g., by sect. 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), in case of offences against girls under thirteen. This section expressly incorporates the provisions of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 18. It would, therefore, seem that it is the intention of the legislature, where a sentence of whipping is imposed on a boy over fourteen and under sixteen years of age, that the instrument to be used should be a birch rod, and the number of strokes should not be more than twenty-five.

(j) 56 & 57 Vict. c. 54 (S. L. R.). This statute repealed in particular 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 9; 7 Will. IV. & Vict. c. 90, s. 2; 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 91, s. 2; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 119; c. 97, s. 75; c. 98, s. 40; and c. 100, s. 70.

(n) Prison Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 41, s. 5). This section provides for an inquiry by the board of visitors or visiting committee of the prison, or other officer to be appointed by the Home Secretary, and for submission to him for confirmation of any order made for whipping. See Convict Prison Rules, 1899, rr. 83, 84, 85; Local Prison Rules, 1899, rr. 89, 90, 91. In military and naval prisons corporal punishment is abolished.

Regulations as to Whipping.—Each of the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 119; c. 97, s. 75; c. 100, s. 70), contains the following clause:—

‘Whenever whipping may be awarded for any indictable offence under this Act, the Court may sentence the offender to be once privately whipped; and the number of strokes, and the instrument with which they shall be inflicted, shall be specified by the Court in the sentence.’

These enactments do not prescribe the instrument or limit the number of strokes.

By the Whipping Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 18), s. 1, where whipping is ordered by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction (in England or Ireland) the order sentence or conviction must specify the number of strokes to be given and the instrument to be used; and in the case of an offender under fourteen years of age, the instrument is to be a birch rod, and the number of strokes is not to exceed twelve. By sect. 2, ‘No offender shall be whipped more than once for the same offence.’

The Garroters Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 44), is as follows:—

‘Whereas by sect. 43 of the Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), it is provided that “whosoever shall, being armed with any offensive weapon or instrument, rob or assault with intent to rob any person, or shall together with one or more other person or persons rob or assault with intent to rob any person, or shall rob any person, and at the time of or immediately before or immediately after such robbery shall wound, beat, strike, or use any other personal violence to any person;” and by sect. 21 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), that “whosoever shall by any means attempt to choke, suffocate, or strangle any person, or by any means calculated to choke, suffocate, or strangle, attempt to render any person insensible, unconscious, or incapable of resistance, with intent in any of such cases thereby to enable himself or any other person to commit, or with intent in any of such cases to assist any other person in committing, any indictable offence, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement”; and whereas the punishment awarded by the said section is insufficient to deter from crimes of violence:’

BE IT ENACTED as follows:

1. ‘Where any person is convicted of a crime under either of the said sections, the Court before whom he is convicted may, in addition to the punishment awarded by the said sections or any part thereof, direct that the offender, if a male, be once, twice, or thrice privately whipped, subject to the following provisions:

- (1) That in the case of an offender whose age does not exceed sixteen years the number of strokes at each such whipping do not exceed twenty-five, and the instrument used shall be a birch rod:
- (2) That in the case of any other male offender the number of strokes do not exceed fifty at each such whipping:
- (3) That in each case the Court in its sentence shall specify the number of strokes to be inflicted and the instrument to be used:

Provided that in no case shall such whipping take place after the expiration of six months from the passing of the sentence; provided also, that every such whipping to be inflicted on any person sentenced to penal servitude shall be inflicted on him before he shall be removed to a convict prison with a view to his undergoing his sentence of penal servitude (oo).⁷

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 10 as amended by s. 128 (1) of the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), limits the whipping to six strokes of a birch rod in the case of a male child between seven and fourteen. Under this Act the whipping is private, and is inflicted by a police constable in the presence of a police inspector or other officer above the rank of a constable, and, if desired, of the parent or guardian of the child. The Children Act, 1908, does not add to or take away from the list of offences for which youthful offenders may be whipped. (See sect. 107.)

SECT. VI.—FINE.

On conviction of any misdemeanor the Court may impose a fine in addition to or in substitution for any other lawful punishment, unless a statute relating to the offence otherwise provides. The amount of the fine (sometimes in the earlier statutes called a ransom) is in the discretion of the Court (p), unless a limit is fixed by statute (q).

Each of the Consolidation Acts of 1861, (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 117; c. 97, s. 73; c. 98, s. 51; c. 99, s. 38, and c. 100, s. 71) contains a provision that 'Wherever any person shall be convicted of any indictable misdemeanor punishable (r) under this Act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to or in lieu of any of the punishments by this Act authorised, fine the offender.' . . .

A fine cannot at common law be imposed on conviction of felony. By sect. 5 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), the Court may sentence a person convicted of manslaughter 'to pay such fine as the Court shall award, in addition to or without any such other discretionary punishment as aforesaid (rr).'⁸

The fine imposed is levied as a Crown debt of record (s), under the Levy of Fines Acts, 1822 and 1823 (t), or enforced by imprisonment (without hard labour) until it is paid. The Courts have no power to remit or mitigate a fine when once duly recorded, and applications for remission are made to the Treasury (u). It used to be said that a fine

(u) In the case of imprisonment for non-payment of fines imposed by a Court of summary jurisdiction, the term of imprisonment is reducible by part payment of the

could not in general be imposed on a married woman, as she had nothing to pay with (v). But since the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), this theory has little or no force.

By the Children Act, 1908, s. 99, (1) 'Where a child or young person is charged before any Court with any offence for the commission of which a fine, damages, or costs may be imposed, and the Court is of opinion that the case would be best met by the imposition of a fine, damages, or costs, whether with or without any other punishment, the Court may in any case, and shall, if the offender is a child, order that the fine, damages, or costs awarded be paid by the parent or guardian (x) of the child or young person, instead of by the child or young person, unless the Court is satisfied that the parent or guardian cannot be found or that he has not conduced to the commission of the offence by neglecting to exercise due care of the child or young person.

(2) Where a child or young person is charged with any offence, the Court may order his parent or guardian 'to give security for his good behaviour.

(3) Where a Court of Summary Jurisdiction thinks that a charge against a child or young person is proved, the Court may make an order on the parent or guardian under this section for the payment of damages or costs or requiring him to give security for good behaviour without proceeding to the conviction of the child or young person.

(4) An order under this section may be made against a parent or guardian who, having been required to attend, has failed to do so, but, save as aforesaid, no such order shall be made without giving the parent or guardian an opportunity of being heard.

(5) Any sums imposed and ordered to be paid by a parent or guardian under this section, or on forfeiture of any such security as aforesaid, may be recovered from him by distress or imprisonment in like manner as if the order had been made on the conviction of the parent or guardian of the offence with which the child or young person was charged.

(6) A parent or guardian may appeal against an order under this section

(a) if made by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to a Court of Quarter Sessions; and

(b) if made by a Court of Assize or a Court of Quarter Sessions to the Court of Criminal Appeal in accordance with the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (xx), as if the parent or guardian against whom the order was made had been convicted on indictment, and the order were a sentence passed on his conviction.'

SECT. VII.—RECOGNISANCES AND SURETIES TO KEEP THE PEACE OR FOR GOOD BEHAVIOUR.

In the case of a misdemeanor, the Courts have, at common law, in addition to any other lawful punishment imposed, the power to require the offender on conviction to enter into recognisances and to find sureties, both or either, to keep the peace and be of good behaviour (y). This power applies even to married women (z). Each of the Consolidation Acts of 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 117; c. 97, s. 73; c. 98, s. 51; c. 99, s. 38; and c. 100, s. 71), contains the following clause:—

‘Whenever any person shall be convicted of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to, or in lieu of any of the punishments by this Act authorised, . . . require him to enter into his own recognisances, and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace and being of good behaviour, and in case of any felony punishable under this Act (a), the Court may, if it shall think fit, require the offender to enter into his own recognisances, and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace in addition to any punishment by this Act authorised: Provided that no person shall be imprisoned under this clause for not finding sureties for any period exceeding one year’ (as to such imprisonment vide 61 & 62 Vict. c. 41, s. 6 (4), ante, p. 213).

SECT. VIII.—PROBATION OF OFFENDERS.

A. Release of Convicts on Licence.

Provision is made by the Penal Servitude Acts for release, on licence or ticket of leave, of persons sentenced to penal servitude (b).

By the Penal Servitude Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99), s. 9, ‘It shall be lawful for His Majesty, by an order in writing under the hand and seal of one of His Majesty’s principal secretaries of state, to grant to any convict now under sentence of transportation, or who may hereafter be sentenced to transportation, or to any punishment substituted for transportation by this Act, a licence to be at large (c) in the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands, or in such part thereof respectively as in such licence shall be expressed, during such portion of his or her term of transportation or imprisonment, and upon such conditions in all respects as to His Majesty shall seem fit; and it shall be lawful for His Majesty to revoke or alter such licence by a like order at His Majesty’s pleasure.’

Sect. 10. ‘So long as such licence shall continue in force and unrevoked, such convict shall not be liable to be imprisoned or transported by reason of his or her sentence, but shall be allowed to go and remain at large according to the term of such licence.'

Sect. 11. If it shall please His Majesty to revoke any such licence, a secretary of state by warrant under his hand, may signify to any one of the police magistrates of the metropolis that such licence has been revoked, and may require such magistrate to issue his warrant for the apprehension of the convict, and such magistrate shall issue his warrant accordingly, and such warrant shall and may be executed by the constable to whom the same shall be delivered for that purpose in any part of the United Kingdom, or in Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, or Sark, and the convict when apprehended shall be brought before the magistrate who issued the warrant, or some other magistrate of the same Court; and he shall thereupon make out his warrant for the recommitment of the convict [to the prison from which he was released] (d), and such convict shall be so recommitted accordingly and shall thereupon be remitted to his or her original sentence, and shall undergo the residue thereof as if no such licence had been granted.

By the Penal Servitude Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 47), s. 4, 'a licence granted under the said Penal Servitude Acts' (of 1853 & 1857) 'may be in the form set forth in Schedule (A.) to this Act annexed, and may be written, printed, or lithographed. If any holder of a licence granted in the form set forth in the said Schedule (A.) is convicted, either by the verdict of a jury or upon his own confession, of any offence for which he is indicted, his licence shall be forthwith forfeited by virtue of such conviction (e). . . .

Sect. 8. Where any holder of any licence granted in the form set forth in the said Schedule (A.) is convicted of an offence, punishable summarily under this or any other Act, the justices, sheriff, sheriff-substitute, or other magistrate convicting the prisoner, shall, without delay, forward by post a certificate in the form given in Schedule (B.) to this Act annexed, if in England or Scotland to one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state, or if in Ireland to the Lord Lieutenant; and thereupon, the licence of the said holder may be revoked in manner provided by the said Penal Servitude Acts.'

Sect. 9. 'Where any licence granted in the form set forth in the said Schedule (A.) is forfeited by a conviction [on indictment of any offence] (f), or is revoked in pursuance of a summary conviction under this Act or any other Act of Parliament, the person whose licence is forfeited or revoked shall, after undergoing any other punishment to

(d) The words in brackets were expressly repealed in 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 66), having been already virtually repealed by the Penal Servitude Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 3), under s. 5 whereof 'such convict may be recommitted by the magistrate issuing his warrant in that behalf either to the prison from which he was released by virtue of his licence or to any other prison in which convicts under sentence of penal servitude may be lawfully confined.'

(e) Rest of section rep. in 1875 (S. L. R.). S. 5 imposes penalties on licence holders for failure to produce the licence or for certain specified breaches of the conditions of the licence.

(f) The Court of trial has no option under this section. R. v. King [1897], 1 Q.B. 214. which he may be sentenced for the offence in consequence of which his licence is forfeited or revoked, further undergo a term of penal servitude equal to the portion of his term of penal servitude that remained unexpired at the time of his licence being granted, and shall, for the purpose of his undergoing such last mentioned punishment, be removed from the prison of any county, borough, or place in which he may be confined, to any prison in which convicts under sentence of penal servitude may lawfully be confined, by warrant under the hand and seal of any justice of the peace of the said county, borough, or place, and shall be liable to be there dealt with in all respects as if such term of penal servitude had formed part of his original sentence' (g).

Sect. 10 empowers His Majesty or the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to grant licences in any other form than that set forth in Schedule (A.) and containing different conditions; and such licences shall be revocable at pleasure by the authority by which they were granted; but a breach of their conditions is not to subject any holder of a licence to summary conviction (h).

By the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), s. 3, 'any constable in any police district may, if authorised so to do in writing by the chief officer of police of that district, without warrant take into custody any convict who is the holder of a licence granted under the Penal Servitude Acts, if it appears to such constable that such convict is getting his livelihood by dishonest means, and may bring him before a court of summary jurisdiction for adjudication (i). If it appears from the facts proved before such court that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the convict so brought before it is getting his livelihood by dishonest means, such convict shall be deemed to be guilty of an offence against this Act, and his licence shall be forfeited.'

By sect. 4, 'where in any licence granted under the Penal Servitude Acts, any conditions different from or in addition to those contained in Schedule A. of the Penal Servitude Act, 1864 (j) are inserted, the holder of such licence, if he breaks any such conditions by an act that is not of itself punishable, either upon indictment or upon summary conviction, shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour. A copy of any conditions annexed to any licence granted under the Penal Servitude Acts, other than the conditions contained in Schedule A. of the Penal Servitude Act, 1864, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within twenty-one days after the making thereof, if Parliament be then sitting, or if not, then within fourteen days after the commencement of the next session of Parliament.'

By sect. 5, 'every holder of a licence granted under the Penal Servitude Acts who is at large in Great Britain or Ireland shall notify the place of

(h) The provisions of this section as to licences in the form in Schedule A. are applied also to a licence in any other form authorised by the section. 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 5, post, p. 226.

[If any person to whom this section applies fails to comply with any of the requisitions of this section, he shall in any such case, be guilty of an offence against this Act (ll), unless he proves to the satisfaction of the Court before whom he is tried, either that being on a journey he tarried no longer in the place, in respect of which he is charged with failing to notify his place of residence, than was reasonably necessary, or that otherwise he did his best to act in conformity with the law; and on conviction of such offence, it shall be lawful for the Court in its discretion either to forfeit his licence or to sentence him to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding one year (m).]

Sect. 6, (sub-sects. 1-5) provides for keeping registers of all persons convicted of crime in the United Kingdom, and for making periodical

(k) The words in brackets were substituted by 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 4, for the original words of the section.

(l) By the Prevention of Crime Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 55), s. 2, 'Any holder of a licence required, under s. 5, and any person subject to the supervision of the police required, under s. 8 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), to notify his residence or any change of his residence to a chief officer of police, shall comply with such requirement by personally presenting himself and declaring his place of residence to the constable or person who at the time when such notification is made is in charge of the police station or office of which notice has been given to such holder or person, as the place for receiving his notification, or if no such notice has been given, in charge of the chief office of such chief officer of police.'

'The power of the chief officer of a police district to direct that the reports required by ss. 5 & 8 of the Prevention of Crimes Act 1871, to be made by holders of licences and persons subject to the supervision of the police, shall be made to some other person, shall extend to authorise him to direct such reports to be made to the constable or person in charge of any particular police station or office without naming the individual person. Any appointment, direction, or authority purporting to be signed by the chief officer of police, and to have been made or given for the purposes of this Act or of ss. 5 & 8 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, or one of them, shall be evidence until the contrary is proved, that the appointment, direction, or authority thereby made or given by the chief officer of police; and evidence that it appears from the records kept by authority of the chief officer of police that a person required as above mentioned to notify his residence or change of residence, or to make a report, has failed to comply with such requirement, shall be prima facie evidence that the person has not complied with such requirement; but if the person charged alleges that he made such notification or report to any particular person or at any particular time, the Court shall require the attendance of such persons as may be necessary to prove the truth or falsehood of such allegation.'

(ll) S. 17 states how offences against the Act may be prosecuted before a Court of summary jurisdiction.

returns of the persons convicted of crime, who came into the custody of the gaoler or governor of any prison (mm).

By sect. 8 of the Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69) power is given to make regulations as to the measuring and photographing 'of all prisoners who may, for the time being, be confined in any prison' (n). The regulations are made in England by the Home Secretary, or in Scotland by the Secretary for Scotland, and in Ireland by the Lord Lieutenant (o). The regulations must be laid before Parliament as soon as practicable after they are made (p).

Special Offences by Persons twice convicted of Crime.—By the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), s. 7 (pp): Where any person is convicted on indictment of a crime (q), and a previous conviction of a crime is proved against him, he shall, at any time within seven years immediately after the expiration of the sentence passed on him for the last of such crimes be guilty of an offence against this Act, and be liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding one year, under the following circumstances, or any of them :—

First. If, on his being charged by a constable with getting his livelihood by dishonest means, and being brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, it appears to such Court that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the person so charged is getting his livelihood by dishonest means : or

Secondly. If, on being charged with any offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction, and on being required by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to give his name and address, he refuses to do so, or gives a false name or a false address : or,

Thirdly. If he is found in any place, whether public or private, under such circumstances as to satisfy the Court before whom he is brought that he was about to commit or to aid in the commission of any offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction, or was waiting for an opportunity to commit or aid in the commission of any offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction : or Fourthly. If he is found in or upon any dwelling-house, or any building, yard, or premises, being parcel of or attached to such dwelling-house, or in or upon any shop, warehouse, counting-house, or other place of business, or in any garden, orchard, pleasure ground, or nursery ground, or in any building or erection in any garden, orchard, pleasure ground, or nursery ground, without being able to account to the satisfaction of (n) In the Act of 1871 the power was limited to photographing, and to all prisoners convicted of crime as defined in s. 20 of that Act, post, p. 224, note (s). By the Prevention of Crimes Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 23), s. 2, power was given to prescribe the classes of convicted prisoners to which alone the rules as to registry and photographing should be applied. The changes made by the Act of 1891 authorise measurement as well as photography, and cover all prisoners whether convicted or not, and in 1893 (S. L. R.), so much of s. 6 of the Act of 1871

as dealt with photographing was repealed.

Any person charged with being guilty of any offence against this Act mentioned in this section may be taken into custody as follows; (that is to say,)

In the case of any such offence against this Act as is first in this section mentioned, by any constable without warrant, if such constable is authorised so to do by the chief officer of police of his district;

In the case of any such offence against this Act as is thirdly in this section mentioned, by any constable without warrant, although such constable is not specially authorised to take him into custody;

Also, where any person is charged with being guilty of an offence against this Act fourthly in this section mentioned, he may, without warrant, be apprehended by any constable, or by the owner or occupier of the property on which he is found, or by the servants of the owner or occupier, or by any other person authorised by the owner or occupier, and may be detained until he can be delivered into the custody of a constable.'

B. Police Supervision.

Police Supervision.—By sect. 8 (r), 'where any person is convicted on indictment of a crime(s), and a previous conviction of a crime is proved against him, the Court having cognisance of such indictment may, in addition to any other punishment which it may award to him, direct that he is to be subject to the supervision of the police for a period of seven years, or of such less period as the Court may direct, commencing immediately after the expiration of the sentence passed on him for the last of such crimes. Every person subject to the supervision of the police who is at large in Great Britain or Ireland shall notify the place of his residence to the chief officer of police of the district which in his residence is situated, and shall whenever he changes such residence within the same police district notify such change to the chief officer of police of that district, and whenever he is about to leave a police district he shall notify such his intention to the chief officer of police of that district stating the place to which he is going, and also if required and so far as practicable his address at that place, and whenever he arrives in any police district he shall notify his place of residence to the chief officer of police of such last-mentioned district (t); moreover, every person subject to the supervision of the police, if a male, shall once in each month report himself at such time as may be prescribed by the chief officer of police of the district in which such holder may be, either to such chief officer himself or to such other person as that officer may direct, and such report may,

(r) Orders made under this section render the supervisee subject to the provisions of 42 & 43 Vict., c. 55, s. 2, ante, p. 222, note (l).

(s) By s. 20, the expression 'crime' means, in England and Ireland, any felony, or the offence of uttering false or counterfeit gold or silver coin, or the offence of obtaining goods or money by false pretences, or the offence of conspiracy to defraud, or any misdemeanor under the s. 58 of the Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 96); and in Scotland, any of the pleas of the crowns, any theft which, in respect of any aggravation, or of the amount in value of the money, goods or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude, any forgery, and any uttering of any forged writing, falsehood, fraud and wilful imposition, uttering base coin, or the possession of such coin with intent to utter the same.

according as such chief officer directs, be made personally or by letter' (u).

The requirements of sect. 8 may be remitted by a secretary of state, either generally or in the case of an individual supervisee (v).

Sect. 8 further provides that '[If any person to whom this section applies fails to comply with any of the requisitions of this section, he shall, in any such case, be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he proves to the satisfaction of the Court before whom he is tried, either that being on a journey he tarried no longer in the place, in respect of which he is charged with failing to notify his place of residence, than was reasonably necessary, or that otherwise he did his best to act in conformity with the law; and on conviction of such offence it shall be lawful for the Court in its discretion either to forfeit his licence, or to sentence him to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding one year]' (w).

The accused may elect to be tried on indictment (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 17) (x). If he does the provisions of sect. 9 of the Act of 1871 (y) as to the indictment do not apply (z).

Sect. 15 provides for the amendment of sect. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, by substituting for the words 'highway or place adjacent' the words 'or any highway or any place adjacent to a street or highway'; and provides also that, 'in proving the intent to commit a felony it shall not be necessary to shew that the person suspected was guilty of any particular act or acts tending to shew his purpose or intent, and he may be convicted if from the circumstances of the case and from his known character as proved to the justice of the peace or Court before whom or which he is brought, it appears to such justice or Court that his intent was to commit a felony . . .'

By the Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69), s. 2—(1) 'Any constable may take into custody without warrant any holder of a licence under the Penal Servitude Acts, or any person under the supervision of the police in pursuance of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, whom he reasonably suspects of having committed any offence, and may take him before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to be dealt with according to law.

(2) Any convict may be convicted before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction of an offence against sect. 3 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (ante, p. 221), although he was brought before the Court on some other charge, or not in manner provided by that section.'

Sect. 3.—(1) 'Where an offender is, under sect. 9 (a) of the Penal Servitude Act, 1864, undergoing, or liable to undergo, a term of penal servitude in consequence of the forfeiture or revocation of a licence granted in pursuance of the Penal Servitude Acts, His Majesty may grant a licence to the offender in like manner as if the forfeiture or revocation of the former licence were a sentence of penal servitude which the offender is liable to undergo.

(u) Persons failing to comply with the section render the supervisee liable to summary conviction (subject to his election to be tried on indictment (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 17), to imprisonment with or without hard labour for not over one year. 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 4 (1).

(2) Where a person is sentenced on any conviction to a term of penal servitude, and by virtue of the same conviction his licence is forfeited, the term for which he is sentenced, together with the term which he is required further to undergo under the said section, shall, for all purposes of the Penal Servitude Acts relating to licences, be deemed to be one term of penal servitude, and those Acts shall apply as if, on conviction of the offence, the offender had been sentenced to the combined term' (aa).

By sect. 4 (1) sects. 5 and 8 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (b), and sect. 2 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1879 (c) (which recites and refers to those sections), are modified as shewn above, pp. 222, 224, 225.

By sub-sect. (2) 'His Majesty may, by order under the hand of a Secretary of State, remit any of the requirements of sects. 5 and 8 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, either generally or in the case of any holder of a licence or person subject to the supervision of the police.'

By sect. 5 'The provisions of the Penal Servitude Act, 1864 (d), applying to a licence in the form set forth in Schedule A. to that Act, shall apply also to a licence in any other form for the time being authorised by sect. 10 of that Act.'

By sect. 6 'A person who has been convicted on indictment of a crime within the meaning of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (dd), and against whom a previous conviction of such a crime is proved, shall,

(a) if the second sentence is to a term of imprisonment, then at any time within seven years after the expiration of the sentence; and

(b) if the second sentence is to a term of penal servitude, then whilst at large on licence under that sentence, and also at any time within seven years after the expiration of the sentence, be guilty of an offence against the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, under the circumstances stated in sect. 7 of that Act (ante, p. 223), or any of them, and may be taken into custody in manner provided by that section.'

By sect. 7 'Sect. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 83), as amended by sect. 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (e), shall be read and construed as if the provisions applying to suspected persons and reputed thieves frequenting (f) the places and with the intent therein described, applied also to every suspected person or reputed thief loitering about or in any of the said places and with the said intent.'

Youthful Offenders.—Youthful offenders sent to certified industrial or reformatory schools, or subject to detention pursuant to the directions of the Secretary of State, may be released on licence under the Children Act, 1908 (ff). The licence is revocable on breach of the conditions on which it was granted.

C. The Probation of Offenders Act, 1907.

At common law the Courts have power, except in capital cases, instead of inflicting immediate punishment, to release an offender on his entering into a recognizance, with or without sureties, to come up for judgment when called on, and in the meantime to keep the peace or be of good behaviour (g). Statutory provision was made in 1887 (h) for the release on probation of certain classes of offenders. Completer provision is made by the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. c. 17) (i), which came into operation on January 1, 1908 (ii).

Conditional Release.—Sect. 1.—(1) ‘Where any person is charged before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction with an offence punishable by such Court, and the Court thinks that the charge is proved, but is of opinion that, having regard to the character, antecedents, age, health, or mental condition of the person charged, or to the trivial nature of the offence, or to the extenuating circumstances under which the offence was committed, it is inexpedient to inflict any punishment or any other than a nominal punishment, or that it is expedient to release the offender on probation, the Court may, without proceeding to conviction, make an order either—

- (i) dismissing the information or charge; or
- (ii) discharging the offender conditionally on his entering into a recognizance, with or without sureties, to be of good behaviour and to appear for conviction and sentence when called on at any time during such period, not exceeding three years, as may be specified in the order (j).

(2) Where any person has been convicted on indictment of any offence punishable with imprisonment (k), and the Court is of opinion that, having regard to the character, antecedents, age, health, or mental condition of the person charged, or to the trivial nature of the offence, or to the extenuating circumstances under which the offence was committed, it is inexpedient to inflict any punishment or any other than a nominal punishment, or that it is expedient to release the offender on probation, the Court may, in lieu of imposing a sentence of imprisonment, make an order discharging the offender conditionally on his entering into a recognizance, with or without sureties, to be of good behaviour and to appear for sentence when called on at any time during such period, not exceeding three years, as may be specified in the order (kk).

(3) The Court may, in addition to any such order, order the offender

(ii) S. 10 (3).

(j) This subsection is based on 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 16, but the provisions italicised are new.

(k) This does not appear to be limited to cases in which imprisonment only or a less punishment may be awarded, but seems to extend to cases in which penal servitude may be imposed as an alternative to imprisonment.

(kk) This subsection does not, except as to release on probation, add anything to the common-law powers of the Court.

to pay such damages for injury or compensation for loss (not exceeding in the case of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction £10, or, if a higher limit is fixed by any enactment relating to the offence, that higher limit) and to pay such costs of the proceedings as the Court thinks reasonable' . . . (l).

Probation Orders and Conditions of Recognizances.—Sect. 2.—(1) A recognizance ordered to be entered into under this Act shall, if the Court so order, contain a condition that the offender be under the supervision of such person as may be named in the order (ll) during the period specified in the order, and such other conditions for securing such supervision as may be specified in the order, and an order requiring the insertion of such conditions as aforesaid in the recognizance is in this Act referred to as a probation order.

(2) A recognizance under this Act may contain such additional conditions as the Court may, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, order to be inserted therein with respect to all or any of the following matters :—

- (a) for prohibiting the offender from associating with thieves and other undesirable persons, or from frequenting undesirable places ;
- (b) as to abstention from intoxicating liquor, where the offence was drunkenness or an offence committed under the influence of drink (m) ;
- (c) generally for securing that the offender should lead an honest and industrious life.

(3) The Court by which a probation order is made shall furnish to the offender a notice in writing stating in simple terms the conditions he is required to observe.

Probation Officers.—Sect. 3.—(1) There may be appointed as probation officer or officers for a petty sessional division such person or persons of either sex as the authority having power to appoint a clerk to the justices of that division may determine, and a probation officer when acting under a probation order shall be subject to the control of petty sessional Courts for the division for which he is so appointed.

(2) There shall be appointed, where circumstances permit, special probation officers, to be called children's probation officers, who shall, in the absence of any reasons to the contrary, be named in a probation order made in the case of an offender under the age of sixteen.

(3) The person named in any probation order shall—

- (a) where the Court making the order is a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, be selected from amongst the probation officers for the petty sessional division in or for which the Court acts ; or
- (b) where the Court making the order is a Court of Assize or a Court of Quarter Sessions, be selected from amongst the probation officers for the petty sessional division from which the person charged was committed for trial :

Provided that the person so named may, if the Court considers it expedient on account of the place of residence of the offender, or for any other special reason, be a probation officer for some other petty sessional division, and may, if the Court considers that the special circumstances of the case render it desirable, be a person who has not been appointed to be probation officer for any petty sessional division.

(4) A probation officer appointed for a petty sessional division may be paid such salary as the authority having the control of the fund out of which the salary of the clerk to the justices of that petty sessional division is paid may determine, and if not so paid by salary may receive such remuneration for acting under a probation order as the Court making the order thinks fit, not exceeding such remuneration as may be allowed by the regulations of such authority as aforesaid, and may in either case be paid such out-of-pocket expenses as may be allowed under such regulations as aforesaid, and the salary or remuneration and expenses shall be paid by that authority out of the said funds.

(5) A person named in a probation order not being a probation officer for a petty sessional division may be paid such remuneration and out-of-pocket expenses out of such fund as the Court making the probation order may direct, not exceeding such as may be allowed under the regulations of the authority having control of the fund out of which the remuneration is directed to be paid.

(6) The person named in a probation order may at any time be relieved of his duties, and in any such case or in case of the death of the person so named, another person may be substituted by the Court before which the offender is bound by his recognizance to appear for conviction or sentence, or, if he be a probation officer for a petty sessional division, by a Court to whose control that officer is subject.

(7) In the application of this Act to the City of London and the metropolitan police court district, the city and each division of that district shall be deemed to be a petty sessional division.

Sect. 4. It shall be the duty of a probation officer, subject to the directions of the Court—

- (a) to visit or receive reports from the person under supervision at such reasonable intervals as may be specified in the probation order or, subject thereto, as the probation officer may think fit ;
- (b) to see that he observes the conditions of his recognizance ;
- (c) to report to the Court as to his behaviour ;
- (d) to advise, assist, and befriend him, and, when necessary, to endeavour to find him suitable employment.

Varying or Discharging Recognizances.—Sect. 5. The Court before which any person is bound by his recognizance under this Act to appear for conviction or sentence may, upon the application of the probation officer, and after notice to the offender, vary the conditions of the recognizance and may, on being satisfied that the conduct of that person has been such as to make it unnecessary that he should remain longer under supervision, discharge the recognizance.

Provision in Case of Breach of Condition.—Sect. 6.—(1) If the Court before which an offender is bound by his recognizance under this Act to appear for conviction or sentence, or any Court of Summary Jurisdiction, is satisfied by information on oath that the offender has failed to observe any of the conditions of his recognizance, it may issue a warrant for his apprehension, or may, if it thinks fit, instead of issuing a warrant in the first instance, issue a summons to the offender and his sureties (if any) requiring him or them to attend at such Court and at such time as may be specified in the summons.

(2) The offender, when apprehended, shall, if not brought forthwith before the Court before which he is bound by his recognizance to appear for conviction or sentence, be brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

(3) The Court before which an offender on apprehension is brought, or before which he appears in pursuance of such summons as aforesaid, may, if it is not the Court before which he is bound by his recognizance to appear for conviction or sentence, remand him to custody or on bail until he can be brought before the last-mentioned Court.

(4) An offender so remanded to custody may be committed during remand to any prison to which the Court having power to convict or sentence him has power to commit prisoners (mm). . . .

(5) A Court before which a person is bound by his recognizance to appear for conviction and sentence, on being satisfied that he has failed to observe any condition of his recognizance, may forthwith, without further proof of his guilt, convict and sentence him for the original offence or, if the case was one in which the Court in the first instance might, under sect. fifteen of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866 (n), have ordered the offender to be sent to a certified industrial school, and the offender is still apparently under the age of twelve years, make such an order.

Power to make Rules.—Sect. 7. The Secretary of State may make rules (o) for carrying this Act into effect, and in particular for prescribing such matters incidental to the appointment, resignation, and removal of probation officers, and the performance of their duties, and the reports to be made by them, as may appear necessary (p).

SECT. IX.—PUNISHMENT OF PERSONS UNDER SIXTEEN.

The Children Act, 1908 (7 Edw. VII. c. 67), has made considerable changes in the law as to punishment of persons under sixteen, and repeals and re-enacts with amendments the Industrial and Reformatory Schools Acts (q).

By sect. 131, 'for the purposes of this Act, unless the context otherwise requires—

The expression "child" means a person under the age of fourteen years (r);

The expression "young person" means a person who is fourteen years of age or upwards and under the age of sixteen years;

(mm) The rest of this section is repealed by the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), and replaced by s. 107 (k) of that Act, post, p. 232.

(n) 29 & 30 Vict. c. 118, now incorporated in the Children Act, 1908: 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, Pt. iv.

(o) Rules were made Nov. 27, 1907, as to the appointment and duties of probation officers and as to reports by them (St. R. & O. 1907, No. 945).

(p) Ss. 8, 9 make the modifications necessary to apply the Act to Scotland and Ireland. S. 10 deals with repeals, &c.

(q) 29 & 30 Vict. cc. 117, 118; 35 & 36 Vict. c. 21; 43 & 44 Vict. c. 15; 54 & 55 Vict. c. 23; 56 & 57 Vict. c. 48; 57 & 58 Vict. c. 33; 62 & 63 Vict. c. 12.

(r) Under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 49, child meant a person under twelve, and young person a person of twelve and under sixteen. This definition is altered by s. 128 of the Children Act, 1908.

The expression "guardian" in relation to a child, young person, or youthful offender, includes any person who, in the opinion of the Court having cognizance of any case in relation to the child, young person, or youthful offender, or in which the child, young person, or youthful offender is concerned, has for the time being the charge of or control over the child, young person, or youthful offender ;

The expression "legal guardian," in relation to an infant, child, young person, or youthful offender, means a person appointed, according to law, to be his guardian by deed or will, or by order of a Court of competent jurisdiction.'

Youthful offender means an offender under the age of sixteen.

By sect. 102—(1) 'A child (rr) shall not be sentenced to imprisonment or penal servitude for any offence, or committed to prison in default of payment of a fine, damages, or costs.

(2) A young person (s) shall not be sentenced to penal servitude for any offence.

(3) A young person shall not be sentenced to imprisonment for an offence, or committed to prison in default of payment of a fine, damages, or costs, unless the Court certifies that the young person is of so unruly a character that he cannot be detained in a place of detention provided under this Part of this Act (t), or that he is of so depraved a character that he is not a fit person to be so detained' (u).

For sect. 103, abolishing capital punishment of children or young persons, vide ante, p. 205.

By sect. 104, 'Where a child or young person is convicted on indictment of an attempt to murder, or of manslaughter, or of wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and the Court is of opinion that no punishment which, under the provisions of this Act, it is authorised to inflict is sufficient, the Court may sentence the offender to be detained for such period as may be specified in the sentence ; and where such a sentence is passed, the child or young person shall during that period, notwithstanding anything in the other provisions of this Act, be liable to be detained in such place and on such conditions as the Secretary of State may direct, and whilst so detained shall be deemed to be in legal custody' (v).

By sect. 106, 'Where a child or young person is convicted of an offence punishable, in the case of an adult, with penal servitude or imprisonment, or would, if he were an adult, be liable to be imprisoned in default of payment of any fine, damages, or costs, and the Court considers that none of the other methods in which the case may legally be dealt with is suitable, the Court may, in lieu of sentencing him to imprisonment or committing him to prison, order that he be committed to custody in a place of detention provided under this Part of this Act (w), and named in the order for such term as may be specified in the order, not exceeding the term for which he might, but for this Part of this Act, be sentenced to imprisonment or committed to prison, nor in any case exceeding one month.*

By sect. 107, 'Where a child or young person charged with any offence is tried by any Court, and the Court is satisfied of his guilt, the Court shall take into consideration the manner in which under the provisions of this or any other Act enabling the Court to deal with the case, the case should be dealt with, namely, whether—

- (a) by dismissing the charge ; or
- (b) by discharging the offender on his entering into a recognisance ; or
- (c) by so discharging the offender and placing him under the supervision of a probation officer (vide s. 60) ; or
- (d) by committing the offender to the care of a relative or other fit person ; or
- (e) by sending the offender to an industrial school (vide s. 58) ; or

- (m) by dealing with the case in any other manner in which it may be legally dealt with :

Provided that nothing in this section shall be construed as authorising the Court to deal with any case in any manner in which it could not deal with the case apart from this section' (z).

Industrial Schools.—By sect. 58(a), (2) 'Where a child apparently under the age of twelve years is charged before a Court of Assize or Quarter Sessions or a Petty Sessional Court, with an offence punishable in the case of an adult by penal servitude or a less punishment, the Court if satisfied on inquiry that it is expedient so to deal with the child, may order him to be sent to a certified industrial school' (b).

(a) Ss. 44-56 deal with the definition, certification, and inspection of reformatory and industrial schools.

(b) Framed on 29 & 30 Vict. c. 118, s. 15 ; 1 Edw. VII. c. 15, s. 5. Children not apparently of the age of twelve or thirteen not previously convicted who are charged before Courts of summary jurisdiction with such offences may be sent to an industrial school subject to a power by the Secretary of State to transfer them to a reformatory, s. 58, subs. 3. him to be so sent, may in accordance with the provisions of Part II. of this Act (c), make an order for the committal of the child to the care of a relative or other fit person named by the Court, and the provisions of that Part shall, so far as applicable, apply as if the order were an order under that Part.

By sect. 60, 'Where under the provisions of this part of this Act an order is made for the committal of a child or young person to the care of a relative or other fit person named by the Court, the Court may in addition to such order make an order under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907 (ante, p. 227), that the child or young person be placed under the supervision of a probation officer :

Provided that the recognizance into which the child, if not charged with an offence, or the young person is required to enter, shall bind him to appear and submit to the further order of the Court.'

A child ordered to be detained under this or following sections continues to be subject to the order during the whole period of detention, even though he attains the age of fourteen before it has expired (d).

Reformatories.—By sect. 57, (1) 'Where a youthful offender, who in the opinion of the Court before which he is charged is twelve years of age or upwards but less than sixteen years of age, is convicted, whether on indictment or by a Petty Sessional Court, of an offence punishable, in the case of an adult, with penal servitude or imprisonment, the Court may, in addition to or in lieu of sentencing him according to law to any other punishment, order that he be sent to a certified reformatory school :

Provided that where the offender is ordered to be sent to a certified reformatory school he shall not in addition be sentenced to imprisonment.

(2) Where such an order has been made in respect of a youthful offender of the age of fourteen years or upwards, and no certified reformatory school can be found the managers of which are willing to receive him, the Secretary of State may order the offender to be brought before the Court which made the order or any Court having the like jurisdiction, and that Court may in lieu of the detention order make such order or pass such sentence of imprisonment as the Court may determine, so however that the order or sentence shall be such as might have been originally made or passed in respect of the offence.'

Power to send Offenders conditionally pardoned to Reformatory Schools.—By sect. 84, 'Where a youthful offender has been sentenced to imprisonment or penal servitude, and has been pardoned by His Majesty on condition of his placing himself under the care of some charitable institution for the reception and reformation of youthful offenders, the Secretary of State may direct him, if under the age of sixteen years, to be sent to a certified reformatory school, the managers of which consent to receive him, for a period of not less than three and not more than five years, but not in any case extending beyond the time when he will in the opinion of the Secretary of State attain the age of nineteen years ; and thereupon the offender shall be subject to all the provisions of this Part of this Act,

By sect. 61, 'An order of a Court ordering a youthful offender or child to be sent to and detained in a certified school (in this Act referred to as a detention order), may, if the Court think fit, be made to take effect either immediately or at any later date specified therein, regard being had to the age or health of the youthful offender or child.'

By sect. 62, (1) 'The school to which a youthful offender or child is to be sent under a detention order shall be such school as may be specified in the order, being some certified school (whether situate within the jurisdiction of the Court making the order or not) the managers of which are willing to receive the youthful offender or child :

Provided that if it is found impossible to specify the school in the detention order, the school shall, subject to the provisions of this Act with respect to the determination of the place of residence of a youthful offender or child, be such as a justice having jurisdiction in the place where the Court which made the order sat may by endorsement on the detention order direct' (f).

By sect. 63, If—

- (a) a detention order is made but is not to take effect immediately; or,
- (b) at the time specified for the order to take effect the youthful offender or child is unfit to be sent to a certified school; or,
- (c) the school to which the youthful offender or child is to be sent cannot be ascertained until inquiry has been made, the Court may make an order committing him either to custody in any place to which he might be committed on remand under Part V. of this Act (g), or to the custody of a relative or other fit person to whose care he might be committed under Part II. of this Act (h), and he shall be kept in that custody accordingly until he is sent to a certified school in pursuance of the detention order.

By sect. 64, (1) 'The person by whom any youthful offender or child ordered to be sent to a certified school is detained shall at the appointed time deliver him into the custody of the constable or other person responsible for his conveyance to school, who shall deliver him to the superintendent or other person in charge of the school in which he is to be detained, together with the order or other document in pursuance of which the offender or child was detained and is sent to the school.

(2) The detention order in pursuance of which the youthful offender or child is sent to a certified school shall be a sufficient authority for his conveyance to and detention in the school or any other school to which he is transferred under this Part of this Act' (i).

By sect. 65, 'The detention order shall specify the time for which the youthful offender or child is to be detained in the school, being—

By sect. 66, (1) The Court or justice, in determining the certified school to which a youthful offender or child is to be sent, shall endeavour to ascertain the religious persuasion to which the offender or child belongs, and the detention order shall, where practicable, specify the religious persuasion to which the offender or child appears to belong, and a school conducted in accordance with that persuasion shall, where practicable, be selected (k).

(3) Where an order has been made for sending a youthful offender or child to a certified school which is not conducted in accordance with the religious persuasion to which the offender belongs, the parent, legal guardian, nearest adult relative, or person entitled to the custody of the offender or child may apply—

(a) If the detention order was made by a Petty Sessional Court, to a Petty Sessional Court acting in and for the place in and for which the Court which made the order acted ; and

(ii) the applicant must show to the satisfaction of the Court or Secretary of State that the managers of the school named by him are willing to receive the offender or child (l) :

(iii) nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing any such person as aforesaid from making an application to the Secretary of State after the expiration of the said period of thirty days to exercise the powers of transfer conferred on him by the other provisions of this Act.

By sect. 69, (1) The Secretary of State may at any time order a youthful offender or a child to be discharged from a certified school, either absolutely or on such conditions as the Secretary of State approves, and may, where the order of discharge is conditional, revoke the order on the breach of any of the conditions on which it was granted, and thereupon the youthful offender or child shall return to school, and if he fails to do so he and any person who knowingly harbours or conceals him or prevents him from returning to school shall be liable to the same penalty as if the youthful offender or child had escaped from the school.

(2) The Secretary of State may order—so however that the whole period of the detention of the offender or child shall not be increased by the transfer.

(3) Where a youthful offender or child is detained in a certified school in one part of the United Kingdom, the central authority for that part of the United Kingdom may, subject to the provisions of this section, direct the youthful offender or child to be transferred to a certified school in another part of the United Kingdom if the central authority for that other part consents.

For the purpose of this provision central authority means the Secretary of State, the Secretary for Scotland, or the Chief Secretary, as the case may be ' (p).

By sect. 70, ' If any youthful offender or child detained in or placed out on licence from a certified school, or a person when under the supervision of the managers of such a school, conducts himself well, the managers of the school may, with his own consent, apprentice him to, or dispose of him in, any trade, calling, or service, including service in the Navy or Army, or by emigration, notwithstanding that his period of detention or supervision has not expired; and such apprenticing or disposition shall be as valid as if the managers were his parents :

Provided that where he is to be disposed of by emigration, and in any case unless he has been detained for twelve months, the consent of the Secretary of State shall also be required for the exercise of any power under this section ' (q).

SECT. X.—DETENTION IN BORSTAL INSTITUTIONS OF OFFENDERS BETWEEN SIXTEEN AND TWENTY-THREE.

By the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 59), s. 1—
(1) ' Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence for which he is liable to be sentenced to penal servitude or imprisonment, and it appears to the Court—

(a) that the person is not less than sixteen nor more than twenty-one years of age ; and

(b) that, by reason of his criminal habits or tendencies, or association with persons of bad character, it is expedient that he should be subject to detention for such term and under such instruction and discipline as appears most conducive to his reformation and the repression of crime, it shall be lawful for the Court, in lieu of passing a sentence of penal servitude or imprisonment, to pass a sentence of detention under penal discipline in a Borstal Institution (r) for a term of not less than one year nor more than three years :

Provided that before passing such a sentence, the Court shall consider any report or representations which may be made to it by or on behalf of the Prison Commissioners as to the suitability of the case for treatment in a Borstal Institution, and shall be satisfied that the character, state of health, and mental condition of the offender, and the other circumstances of the case, are such that the offender is likely to profit by such instruction and discipline as aforesaid.

(2) The Secretary of State may by order direct that this section shall extend to persons apparently under such age not exceeding the age of twenty-three (s) as may be specified in the order, and upon such an order being made this section shall, whilst the order is in force, have effect as if the specified age were substituted for "twenty-one":

Provided that such an order shall not be made until a draft thereof has lain before each House of Parliament for not less than thirty days during the session of Parliament, and if either House, before the expiration of that period, presents an address to His Majesty against the draft or any part thereof, no further proceedings shall be taken thereon, but without prejudice to the making of any new draft order.'

Substitution of Borstal Institution for Reformatory.—Sect. 2. 'Where a youthful offender sentenced to detention in a reformatory school (t) is convicted under any Act before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction of the offence of committing a breach of the rules of the school, or of inciting to such a breach, or of escaping from such a school, and the Court might under that Act sentence the offender to imprisonment, the Court may, in lieu of sentencing him to imprisonment, sentence him to detention in a Borstal Institution for a term not less than one year nor more than three years, and in such case the sentence shall supersede the sentence of detention in a reformatory school.'

Transfer from Prison to Borstal Institution.—Sect. 3. 'The Secretary of State may, if satisfied that a person undergoing penal servitude or imprisoned in consequence of a sentence passed either before or after the passing of this Act, being within the limits of age within which persons may be detained in a Borstal Institution, might with advantage be detained in a Borstal Institution, authorise the Prison Commissioners to transfer him from prison to a Borstal Institution, there to serve the whole or any part of the unexpired residue of his sentence, and whilst detained in, or placed out on licence from, such an institution, this Part of this Act shall apply to him as if he had been originally sentenced to detention in a Borstal Institution.'

Sect. 4.—(1) 'For the purposes of this Part of this Act the Secretary of State may establish Borstal Institutions (u), that is to say, places in which young offenders whilst detained may be given such industrial training and other instruction, and be subjected to such disciplinary and moral influences as will conduce to their reformation and the prevention of crime, and for that purpose may, with the approval of the Treasury, authorise the Prison Commissioners either to acquire any land or to erect or acquire any building or to appropriate the whole or any part of any land or building vested in them or under their control, and any expenses incurred under this section shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament.

(2) The Secretary of State may make regulations for the rule and

(s) Recommended by the Prison Commissioners (Parl. Pap. 1908, c. 3738, p. 26).

(t) Vide ante, p. 233.

(u) Up to 1908 offenders were dealt with on the Borstal system in Borstal and Lincoln Prisons under special rules of July, 1906 (St. R. & O. 1906, No. 525), and in certain other prisons. See Prison Commissioners' Report (Parl. Pap. 1908, c. 3738, pp. 14-26).

management of any Borstal Institution, and the constitution of a visiting committee thereof, and for the classification, treatment, and employment and control of persons sent to it in pursuance of this Part of this Act, and for their temporary detention until arrangements can be made for sending them to the institution, and, subject to any adaptations, alterations, and exceptions made by such regulations, the Prison Acts, 1865 to 1898 (including the penal provisions thereof), and the rules thereunder, shall apply in the case of every such institution as if it were a prison.'

Sect. 5.—(1) 'Subject to regulations by the Secretary of State, the Prison Commissioners may at any time after the expiration of six months, or, in the case of a female, three months, from the commencement of the term of detention, if satisfied that there is a reasonable probability that the offender will abstain from crime and lead a useful and industrious life, by licence permit him to be discharged from the Borstal Institution on condition that he be placed under the supervision or authority of any society or person named in the licence who may be willing to take charge of the case.

(2) A licence under this section shall be in force until the term for which the offender was sentenced to detention has expired, unless sooner revoked or forfeited.

(3) Subject to regulations by the Secretary of State, a licence under this section may be revoked at any time by the Prison Commissioners, and where a licence has been revoked the person to whom the licence related shall return to the Borstal Institution, and if he fails to do so may be apprehended without warrant and taken to the institution.

(4) If a person absent from a Borstal Institution under such a licence escapes from the supervision of the society or person in whose charge he is placed, or commits any breach of the conditions contained in the licence, he shall be considered thereby to have forfeited the licence.

(5) A Court of Summary Jurisdiction for the place where the Borstal Institution from which a person has been placed out on licence is situate or where such a person is found may, on information on oath that the licence has been forfeited under this section, issue a warrant for his apprehension, and he shall, on apprehension, be brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, which, if satisfied that the licence has been forfeited, may order him to be remitted to the Borstal Institution, and may commit him to any prison within the jurisdiction of the Court until he can conveniently be removed to the institution.

(6) The time during which a person is absent from a Borstal Institution under such a licence shall be treated as part of the time of his detention in the institution: Provided that where that person has failed to return to the institution on the licence being forfeited or revoked, the time which elapses after his failure so to return shall be excluded in computing the time during which he is to be detained in the institution.

(7) A licence under this section shall be in such form and shall contain such conditions as may be prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State.'

Supervision after Expiration of Term of Sentence.—Sect. 6.—(1) 'Every person sentenced to detention in a Borstal Institution shall, on the expiration of the term of his sentence, remain for a further period of six months under the supervision of the Prison Commissioners.

(2) The Prison Commissioners may grant to any person under their supervision a licence in accordance with the last foregoing section, and may revoke any such licence and recall the person to a Borstal Institution, and any person so recalled may be detained in a Borstal Institution for a period not exceeding three months, and may at any time be again placed out on licence :

Provided that a person shall not be so recalled unless the Prison Commissioners are of opinion that the recall is necessary for his protection, and they shall again place him out on licence as soon as possible and at latest within three months after the recall, and that a person so recalled shall not in any case be detained after the expiration of the said period of six months' supervision.

(3) A licence granted to a person before the expiration of his sentence of detention in a Borstal Institution shall, on his becoming liable to be under supervision in accordance with this section, continue in force after the expiration of that term, and may be revoked in manner provided by the last foregoing section.

(4) The Secretary of State may at any time order that a person under supervision under this section shall cease to be under such supervision.'

Transfer from Borstal Institution to Prison.—Sect. 7. 'Where a person detained in a Borstal Institution is reported to the Secretary of State by the visiting committee of such institution to be incorrigible, or to be exercising a bad influence on the other inmates of the institution, the Secretary of State may commute the unexpired residue of the term of detention to such term of imprisonment, with or without hard labour, as the Secretary of State may determine, but in no case exceeding such unexpired residue.'

Sect. 8. 'Where a society has undertaken the duty of assisting or supervising persons discharged from a Borstal Institution, either absolutely or on licence, there may be paid to the society out of money provided by Parliament towards the expenses of the society incurred in connection with the persons so discharged such sums on such conditions as the Secretary of State, with the approval of the Treasury, may recommend.'

Transfer from one Part of British Islands to Another.—Sect. 9. 'Where a person has been sentenced to detention in a Borstal Institution in one part of the United Kingdom, the Secretary of State, the Secretary for Scotland, or the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as the case may be, may, as authority under this Act for that part of the United Kingdom, direct that person to be removed to and detained in a Borstal Institution in another part of the United Kingdom, with the consent of the authority under this Act for that other part.'

SECT. XI.—PREVENTIVE DETENTION OF HABITUAL CRIMINALS.

By the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 59), which came into force on August 1, 1909 (vide s. 10 (2)).

Sect. 10.—(1) 'Where a person is convicted on indictment of a crime, committed after the passing of this Act, and subsequently the offender admits that he is or is found by the jury to be a habitual criminal (vv), and the Court passes a sentence of penal servitude, the Court, if of opinion that by reason of his criminal habits and mode of life it is expedient for the protection of the public that the offender should be kept in detention for a lengthened period of years, may pass a further sentence ordering that on the determination of the sentence of penal servitude he be detained for such period not exceeding ten nor less than five years, as the Court may determine, and such detention is hereinafter referred to as preventive detention, and a person on whom such a sentence is passed shall, whilst undergoing both the sentence of penal servitude and the sentence of preventive detention, be deemed for the purposes of the Forfeiture Act, 1870 (vv), and for all other purposes, to be a person convicted of felony.

(2) A person shall not be found to be a habitual criminal unless the jury finds on evidence—

(a) that since attaining the age of sixteen years he has at least three times previously to the conviction of the crime charged in the said indictment, been convicted of a crime, whether any such previous conviction was before or after the passing of this Act, and he is leading persistently (w) a dishonest or criminal life; or

(b) that he has on such a previous conviction been found to be a habitual criminal and sentenced to preventive detention.

(3) In any indictment under this section it shall be sufficient, after charging the crime, to state that the offender is a habitual criminal.

(4) In the proceedings on the indictment the offender shall in the first instance be arraigned on so much only of the indictment as charges the crime, and if on arraignment he pleads guilty or is found guilty by the jury, the jury shall, unless he pleads guilty to being a habitual criminal, be charged to inquire whether he is a habitual criminal, and in that case it shall not be necessary to swear the jury again:

Provided that a charge of being a habitual criminal shall not be inserted in an indictment—

(a) without the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ww); and

(b) unless not less than seven days' notice has been given to the proper officer of the Court by which the offender is to be tried, and to the offender, that it is intended to insert such a charge, and the notice to the offender shall specify the previous convictions, and the other grounds upon which it is intended to found the charge.

(5) Without prejudice to any right of the accused to tender evidence as to his character and repute, evidence of character and repute may, if the Court thinks fit, be admitted as evidence on the question whether the accused is or is not leading persistently a dishonest or criminal life.

(v) Cf. the provisions as to habitual drunkards, post, p. 244. Habitual offenders confined in local prisons have been separated from other offenders since 1899. Sect. 11. 'A person sentenced to preventive detention may, notwithstanding anything in the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (z), appeal against the sentence without the leave of the Court of Criminal Appeal.'

Power in Certain Cases to commute Penal Servitude to Preventive Detention.—Sect. 12. 'Where a person has been sentenced, whether before or after the passing of this Act, to penal servitude for a term of five years or upwards (zz), and he appears to the Secretary of State to have been a habitual criminal within the meaning of this Act, the Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, at any time after three years of the term of penal servitude have expired, commute the whole or any part of the residue of the sentence to a sentence of preventive detention, so, however, that the total term of the sentence when so commuted shall not exceed the term of penal servitude originally awarded.'

Effect and Execution of Sentence.—Sect. 13.—'(1) The sentence of preventive detention shall take effect immediately on the determination of the sentence of penal servitude, whether that sentence is determined by effluxion of time or by order of the Secretary of State at such earlier date as the Secretary of State, having regard to the circumstances of the case, and in particular to the time at which the convict, if sentenced to penal servitude alone, would ordinarily have been licensed to be at large, may direct.

(2) Persons undergoing preventive detention shall be confined in any prison or part of a prison which the Secretary of State may set apart for the purpose, and shall (save as otherwise provided by this Act) be subject to the law for the time being in force with respect to penal servitude as if they were undergoing penal servitude :

Provided that the rules applicable to convicts and convict prisons shall apply to persons undergoing preventive detention, and to the prisons or parts of prisons in which they are detained, subject to such modifications in the direction of a less rigorous treatment as the Secretary of State may prescribe by prison rules within the meaning of the Prison Act, 1898 (a).

(3) Persons undergoing preventive detention shall be subjected to such disciplinary and reformatory influences, and shall be employed on such work as may be best fitted to make them able and willing to earn an honest livelihood on discharge.

(4) The Secretary of State shall appoint for every such prison or part of a prison so set apart a board of visitors, of whom not less than two shall be justices of the peace, with such powers and duties as he may prescribe—by such prison rules as aforesaid.'

Discharge on Licence.—Sect. 14.—‘(1) The Secretary of State shall, once at least in every three years during which a person is detained in custody under a sentence of preventive detention, take into consideration the condition, history, and circumstances of that person with a view to determining whether he shall be placed out on licence, and, if so, on what conditions.

(2) The Secretary of State may at any time discharge on licence a person undergoing preventive detention if satisfied that there is a reasonable probability that he will abstain from crime and lead a useful and industrious life or that he is no longer capable of engaging in crime, or that for any other reason it is desirable to release him from confinement in prison.

(3) A person so discharged on licence may be discharged on probation, and on condition that he be placed under the supervision or authority of any society or person named in the licence who may be willing to take charge of the case, or on such other conditions as may be specified in the licence.

(4) The Directors of Convict Prisons shall report periodically to the Secretary of State on the conduct and industry of persons undergoing preventive detention, and their prospects and probable behaviour on release, and for this purpose shall be assisted by a committee at each prison in which such persons are detained, consisting of such members of the board of visitors and such other persons of either sex as the Secretary of State may from time to time appoint.

(5) Every such committee shall hold meetings, at such intervals of not more than six months as may be prescribed, for the purpose of personally interviewing persons undergoing preventive detention in the prison and preparing reports embodying such information respecting them as may be necessary for the assistance of the Directors, and may at any other times hold such other meetings, and make such special reports respecting particular cases, as they may think necessary.

(6) A licence under this section may be in such form and may contain such conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of State.

(7) The provisions relating to licences to be at large granted to persons undergoing penal servitude shall not apply to persons undergoing preventive detention.’

Sect. 15.—‘(1) The society or person under whose supervision or authority a person is so placed shall periodically, in accordance with regulations made by the Secretary of State, report to the Secretary of State on the conduct and circumstances of that person.

(2) A licence under this part of this Act may be revoked at any time by the Secretary of State, and where a licence has been revoked, the person to whom the licence related shall return to the prison, and, if he fails to do so, may be apprehended without warrant and taken to prison.

(3) If a person absent from prison under such a licence escapes from the supervision of the society or person in whose charge he is placed, or commits any breach of the conditions contained in the licence, he shall be considered thereby to have forfeited the licence, and shall be taken back to prison.

(4) A Court of Summary Jurisdiction for the place where the prison from which a person has been discharged on licence is situate, or where such a person is found, may, on information on oath that the licence has been forfeited under this section, issue a warrant for his apprehension, and he shall, on apprehension, be brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, which, if satisfied that the licence has been forfeited, shall order him to be remitted to preventive detention, and may commit him to any prison within the jurisdiction of the Court until he can conveniently be removed to a prison or part of a prison set apart for the purpose of the confinement of persons undergoing preventive detention.

(5) The time during which a person is absent from prison under such a licence shall be treated as part of the term of preventive detention.

Provided that, where such person has failed to return on the licence being forfeited or revoked, the time which elapses after his failure so to return shall be excluded in computing the unexpired residue of the term of preventive detention.'

Absolute Discharge.—Sect. 16. 'Without prejudice to any other powers of discharge, the Secretary of State may at any time discharge absolutely any person discharged conditionally on licence under this Part of this Act, and shall so discharge him at the expiration of five years from the time when he was first discharged on licence if satisfied that he has been observing the conditions of his licence and abstaining from crime' (b).

SECT. XII.—DETENTION OF HABITUAL DRUNKARDS.

The following enactments provide for special treatment of offenders who are habitual drunkards.

'Habitual drunkard means a person who, not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy, is notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to himself or herself or to others, or incapable of managing himself or herself and his or her affairs' (c).

By the Inebriates Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 60), sect. 1, (1) Where a person is convicted (d) on an indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment or penal servitude, if the Court is satisfied from the evidence (e) that the offence was committed under the influence of drink, or that drunkenness was a contributory cause of the offence (f), and the offender admits that he is, or is found by the jury to be, an habitual drunkard, the Court may, in addition to or in substitution

(b) Ss. 16, 17 adapt the Act to Scotland and Ireland. S. 18 (2) fixes the commencement of the Act, Aug. 1, 1909.

(c) 42 & 43 Vict. c. 19, s. 3, incorporated by 61 & 62 Vict. c. 60, s. 30. See Eaton v. Best [1909], 1 K.B. 632; 73 J.P. 113.

(d) Convicted has been held to include a plea of guilty. R. v. Mehan [1905], 2

Ir. Rep. 577.

(e) Quære, including the depositions. So held in R. v. Mehan, ubi sup. Palles, C.B., dissented. The question seems to be for the Court, not for the jury.

(f) As to criminal responsibility of drunken persons, vide ante, p. 87.

for any other sentence, order that he be detained for a term not exceeding three years in any state inebriate reformatory, or in any certified inebriate reformatory the managers of which are willing to receive him.

(2) In any indictment under this section it shall be sufficient, after charging the offence, to state that the offender is an habitual drunkard. In the proceedings on the indictment the offender shall, in the first instance, be arraigned on so much only of the indictment as charges the said offence, and if on arraignment he pleads guilty or is found guilty by the jury, the jury shall, unless the offender admits that he is an habitual drunkard, be charged to inquire whether he is an habitual drunkard, and in that case it shall not be necessary to swear the jury again.

Provided that, unless evidence that the offender is an habitual drunkard has been given before he is committed for trial, not less than seven days' notice shall be given to the proper officer of the Court by which the offender is to be tried, and to the offender, that it is intended to charge habitual drunkenness in the indictment.

Special powers as to habitual drunkards convicted of cruelty to children are given by the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 26, post, Book IX., Chapter VIII.).

By sect. 2, '(1) Any person who commits any of the offences mentioned in the first schedule to this Act, and who within the twelve months preceding the date of the commission of the offence has been convicted summarily at least three times of any offences so mentioned, and who is an habitual drunkard, shall be liable on conviction on indictment, or if he consents to be dealt with summarily (g), on summary conviction, to be detained for a term not exceeding three years in any certified inebriate reformatory the managers of which are willing to receive him (gg).

(2) The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), shall apply to proceedings under this section as if the offence charged were specified in the second column of the first schedule to the Act' (h).

If the accused elects to be tried on indictment under sub-sect. 2, the Court of trial cannot impose any punishment for the offence of which he is then convicted, but can only deal with him as an habitual drunkard.

By the Inebriates Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 35), s. 1, the costs of a prosecution or indictment under the above section are payable out of the local rate (vide post, Book XII., Chapter V.).

Sects. 3-12 of the Act of 1898 provide for the establishment and regulation of state inebriate reformatories (i), and for certification and regulation of inebriate reformatories maintained by county or borough councils or private enterprise (j).

(g) Under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 12, the consent is a condition precedent to the right to try summarily. Commissioner of Police v. Donovan [1903], 1 K.B. 895; 19 Cox, 435.

SECT. XIII.—GENERAL RULES AS TO OTHER PUNISHMENTS.

Persons under sixteen may not be sentenced to death or to penal servitude for any offence. As to the substituted penalties, vide ante, pp. 205, 231.

Felonies.—By the Criminal Law Act, 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28), s. 8, 'Every person convicted of any felony, not punishable with death (m), shall be punished in the manner prescribed by the statute or statutes specially relating to such felony (n); and every person convicted of any felony, for which no punishment hath been or hereafter may be specially provided, shall be deemed to be punishable under this Act, and shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be transported beyond the seas for the term of seven years or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years : (nn)

By sect. 11 (o), 'If any person shall be convicted of any felony not punishable with death, committed after a previous conviction of felony (p), such person shall on such subsequent conviction be liable . . . to be transported beyond the seas (q) for life, or for any term not less than seven years . . . ' (r).

These provisions do not apply to persons under sixteen (vide ante, p. 231).

By the Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 7 (s), 'Whosoever shall commit the offence of simple larceny after a previous conviction for felony, whether such conviction shall have taken place upon an indictment, or under the provisions of the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126 (t), shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding ten years . . . (u), or to be imprisoned . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping' (v).

Larceny after Conviction of an Indictable Misdemeanor.—Sect. 8. 'Whosoever shall commit the offence of simple larceny, or any offence hereby made punishable like simple larceny (w) after having been (n) For the special statutes, see the titles relating to particular felonies.

(nn) As to minimum term of penal servitude and as to hard labour, vide ante, pp. 211, 212.

(o) A like provision is made as to Ireland by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 21.

(p) Superseded as to 'larceny' by the enactments specified infra, and as to certain coinage offences by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, ss. 12, 21.

(q) Now penal servitude, vide ante, p. 211.

(r) Now not less than three years, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years. 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1 (ante, pp. 211, 212). The rest of the section was repealed, as to whipping in 1888 (S. L. R.), and as to minimum term of imprisonment in 1893 (S. L. R. No. 2).

(s) By s. 12 of the Penal Servitude Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99), the punishment in case of larceny after a previous conviction of felony was reduced to a term of penal servitude for not less than four nor more than ten years. This enactment was repealed in 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, s. 1), and replaced by that set out in the text.

(t) By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126, justices of the peace might convict persons guilty of larceny, &c., summarily, and this clause renders persons so convicted, who afterwards are guilty of larceny, liable to the same punishment as if they had been previously convicted upon an indictment for felony. It is superseded by the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49).

(u) As to other punishments, see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212, and as to police supervision, see ante, p. 224.

(v) The omitted portions were repealed in 1893 (S. L. R. No. 2). As to whipping, see ante, p. 215.

(w) That is by ss. 31, 32, 33, and 36. S. 8 does not apply to a conviction under s. 88 for false pretences. R. v. Horn, 15 Cox, 205.

previously convicted of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . . or to be imprisoned . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping' (x).

Larceny after Two Summary Convictions.—Sect. 9. 'Whosoever shall commit the offence of simple larceny, or any offence hereby made punishable like simple larceny, after having been twice summarily convicted of any of the offences punishable upon summary conviction, under the provisions contained in . . . the Act of the session held in the tenth and eleventh years of Queen Victoria, chapter eighty-two, . . . or in this Act or the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97) (whether each of the convictions shall have been in respect of an offence of the same description or not, and whether such convictions or either of them shall have been or shall be before or after the passing of this Act), shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . . or to be imprisoned . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping' (y).

Punishment of Principals in Second Degree, and Accessories.—The Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, ss. 4, 8), and each of the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 98; c. 97, s. 56; c. 98, s. 49; c. 99, s. 35; and c. 100, s. 67), enact that 'In the case of every felony punishable under this Act, every principal in the second degree, and every accessory before the fact, shall be punishable in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this Act punishable (z), . . . and whosoever shall counsel, aid, or abet the commission of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act shall be liable to be proceeded against, indicted, and punished as a principal offender' (a).

Cumulative Sentences.—By the Criminal Law Act, 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28), s. 10, 'Wherever sentence shall be passed for felony on a person already imprisoned under sentence for another crime, it shall be lawful for the Court to award imprisonment for the subsequent offence, to commence at the expiration of the imprisonment to which such person shall have been previously sentenced; and where such person shall be (x) This section was new in 1861. See R. v. Garland, 11 Cox, 222. The omitted portions were repealed in 1893 (S. L. R. No. 2), vide ante, pp. 211, 212.

(y) Taken from 12 & 13 Vict. c. 11, s. 3, and extended so as to include persons twice summarily convicted under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 92, ss. 3, 4, 5, & 6 (I), or the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, or the Larceny Act, 1861. The omitted portions of s. 9 were repealed in 1893 (S. L. R. No. 2). They included references to a number of statutes now repealed, viz., 7 & 8 Geo. IV. cc. 29, 30; 9 Geo. IV. cc. 55, 56; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 59; and to ss. 3, 4, 5, and 6 of 14 & 15 Vict.

c. 92. It is not clear why the reference to 10 & 11 Vict. c. 82 remains, as that Act was repealed in 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 55), not why 14 & 15 Vict. c. 92 was struck out, as s. 6 is not repealed. As to minimum term of penal servitude, see p. 211. As to hard labour, see ante, p. 212. As to whipping, see ante, p. 215.

(z) As to accessories after the fact, vide ante, p. 126.

(a) This clause is omitted in the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, but the omission is supplied by s. 8 of the Accessories, &c., Act, 1861, ante, p. 138.

already under sentence, either of imprisonment or of transportation (b), the Court, if empowered to pass sentence of transportation (b), may award such sentence for the subsequent offence, to commence at the expiration of the imprisonment or transportation (b) to which such person shall have been previously sentenced, although the aggregate term of imprisonment or transportation (b) respectively may exceed the term for which either of those punishments could be otherwise awarded.' The rule above laid down as to felony applies at common law to misdemeanor (c).

So that, where a person is convicted of several offences at the same time, of the same kind, he may be sentenced to several terms of penal servitude or imprisonment one after the conclusion of the other (d). Where an indictment for perjury contained two counts charging perjury on two different occasions but with the same object, it was held that they were distinct offences which might, however, be included in one indictment; that a general verdict of guilty was good, and that the full punishment of seven years' penal servitude might be inflicted for each offence, the second term to begin at the termination of the first (e).

As to the effect of conviction of a person out on ticket of leave, see 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 9, as amended by 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 3, vide ante, p. 220.

Misdemeanors.—As a general rule all offences less than felony, which exist at common law, and have not been regulated by any particular statute, are punishable within the discretion of the Court (f). Fine, and imprisonment, without hard labour (ante, p. 212), are the remaining common-law punishments in cases of misdemeanor. On the abolition of the punishment of the pillory (g), it was provided by 56 Geo. III. c. 128, s. 2, that the Courts might pass such sentence of fine or imprisonment, or of both, in lieu of a sentence of pillory, as to the Court should seem proper. Whipping also was ordinarily awarded in former times, but it is not now adjudged except under statutory authority. The offender may, at common law, in addition to fine and imprisonment, be required to find sureties to keep the peace or be of good behaviour (h).

The common-law punishments may be imposed where a statute declares an offence to be a misdemeanor but prescribes no specific punishment, and in cases where disobedience to the command or prohibition of a statute is held by the Courts to be a misdemeanor (i).

(b) Now penal servitude. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3, s. 6, ante, p. 211.

SECT. XIV.—OBSOLETE PUNISHMENTS.

Pillory.—On conviction of misdemeanor it was not unusual to sentence the offender to the pillory (j). The punishment was recognised by the common law, and in some cases imposed by statute (k) ; but was partially abolished by the Pillory Abolition Act, 1816 (56 Geo. 3, c. 138) (l), and wholly abolished in 1837 (m). By sect. 2 of the Act of 1816, ‘in all cases where the punishment of the pillory has hitherto (i.e. before July 2, 1816) formed the whole or a part of the judgment to be pronounced, it shall and may be lawful for the Court before whom such offence is tried to pass such sentence of fine or imprisonment, or of both, in lieu of the sentence of pillory as to the said Court shall seem most proper ; provided that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, in any manner to change, alter, or affect any punishment which may now be by law inflicted in respect of any offence except only the punishment of pillory.’

Stocks.—At common law it is said that every township was bound to provide stocks in which the constable might confine offenders for security but not by way of punishment. By statutes most if not all now repealed setting in the stocks was authorised by way of punishment after conviction (n).

Ducking Stool.—The punishment of the ducking stool for scolds has not been formally abolished (o).

SECT. XV.—CIVIL EFFECTS OF CONVICTION.

Treason and Felony : Forfeitures for Felony, &c.

The Forfeiture Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23), recites that it is expedient to abolish the forfeiture of lands and goods for treason and felony, and to otherwise amend the law relating thereto. By sect. 1, ‘From and after the passing of this Act, no confession, verdict, inquest, conviction, or judgment of, or for any treason or felony, or felo de se, shall cause any attainer or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture, or escheat, provided that nothing in this Act shall affect the law of forfeiture consequent upon outlawry’ (p).

Sect. 2. ‘Provided nevertheless, that if any person hereafter convicted of treason or felony, for which he shall be sentenced to death, or penal servitude, or any term of imprisonment, with hard labour, or exceeding twelve months, shall at the time of such conviction hold any military or naval office, or any civil office under the Crown, or other public employment, or any ecclesiastical benefice, or any place, office, or emolument in any university, college, or other corporation, or be entitled to any pension, or superannuation allowance, payable by the public, or out of any public fund, such office, benefice, employment, or place, shall forthwith become vacant, and such pension or superannuation allowance or emolument shall forthwith determine and cease to be payable, unless such person shall receive a free pardon from His Majesty within two months after such conviction, or before the filling up of such office, benefice, employment, or place, if given at a later period; and such person shall become, and (until he shall have suffered the punishment to which he had been sentenced, or such other punishment as by competent authority may be substituted for the same, or shall receive a free pardon from His Majesty) shall continue thenceforth incapable of holding any military or naval office, or any civil office under the Crown, or other public employment, or any ecclesiastical benefice, or of being elected, or sitting, or voting as a member of either House of Parliament, or of exercising any right of suffrage or other parliamentary or municipal franchise whatever within England, Wales, or Ireland' (q).

By the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), s. 101, 'The conviction of a child or young person shall not be regarded as a conviction of felony for the purposes of any disqualification attaching to felony' (qq).

Conviction of treason or felony, or outlawry, or criminal process, or conviction of infamous crime, unless pardoned, disqualifies the offender from serving as a juror (r).

By sect. 4 of the Act of 1870, 'it shall be lawful for any such Court as aforesaid, if it shall think fit upon the application of any person aggrieved, and immediately after the conviction of any person for felony, to award any sum of money, not exceeding one hundred pounds, by way of satisfaction or compensation for any loss of property suffered by the applicant through or by means of the said felony, and the amount awarded for such satisfaction or compensation shall be deemed a judgment debt due to the person entitled to receive the same from the person so convicted, and the order for payment of such amount may be enforced in such and the same manner as in the case of any costs ordered by the Court to be paid under the last preceding section of this Act' (s).

By sect. 5, 'The word "forfeiture," in the construction of this Act, shall not include any fine or penalty imposed on any convict by virtue of his sentence' (t).

By sect. 32, 'Provided always that nothing in this Act shall be deemed to alter or in any wise affect the law relating to felony in England, Wales, or Ireland, except as herein is expressly stated.'

(s) See R. v. Lovett, 11 Cox, 602.

(t) Ss. 6-30 regulate the administration, &c., of the property of convicts sentenced to penal servitude for treason or felony, while they are in prison undergoing their sentence. The sections cease to apply if they die or become bankrupt, or receive a pardon (s. 7), and do not apply to property acquired while at large on licence (s. 30). As to these sections, see Carr v. Anderson [1903], 1 Ch. 90; 2 Ch. 279; and Gaskell & Walters' Contract [1906], 2 Ch. 1; and see 8 Edw. VII. c. 15, post, Bk. xii. c. v.

any person who shall have been so convicted as aforesaid; and if any person shall, after having been so convicted as aforesaid, take out or have any licence to sell spirits by retail, the same shall be void to all intents and purposes; and every person who, after being so convicted as aforesaid, shall sell any spirits by retail in any manner whatever, shall incur the penalty for doing so without a licence' (u).

In the case of convictions of felony not falling within sects. 2, 6–27 of the Act of 1870, and in the case of conviction for misdemeanor, the civil rights of the offender in respect of his property are not affected. But conviction and imprisonment for crime disqualify the offender from holding certain offices, e.g., district councillor or guardian of the poor (v).

SECT. XVI.—PARDON OR REMISSION OR MITIGATION OF PUNISHMENT.

In passing a sentence on conviction, the Court should take into consideration all offences of a similar nature already committed by the prisoner, and of which he admits the commission, but for which he has not been actually tried (vv).

When a sentence involving punishment has been passed and duly recorded, the Court of trial has no power to remit it. On appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal the punishment may be reduced or increased by the appellate Court (w).

The power to pardon the offence, or commute or remit or reduce the punishment or fine for a criminal offence, is part of the prerogative of the Crown (x), which cannot be delegated to a subject as to matters in England and Wales (27 Hen. VIII. c. 24, s. 1), and is distinct from the provisions made under the statutes and rules relating to convict prisons and local prisons which authorise the absolute or conditional release of offenders before the expiration of any term of penal servitude or imprisonment lawfully adjudged.

A. Pardon.

By virtue of the prerogative of mercy the Crown may grant a free pardon for an offence, which restores the offender to the status which he held before conviction (y).

A free pardon may be granted either before or after trial. Where a pardon is granted at any one's suggestion, the fact of the suggestion and the name of the person making it should be in the pardon (27 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 2); and pardons for treason, murder, or rape are not to be granted unless the offence is specified in the pardon (13 Rich. II. st. 2, c. 1; 16 Rich. II. c. 6. See 1 C. & P. 456, note to R. v. Beacall).

At common law pardons must be under the Great Seal (z).

(u) See Hay v. Tower Justices, 24 Q.B.D. 561.

Conditional Pardon.—The Crown may grant a pardon on conditions.

A conditional pardon for treason may be granted and the condition enforced even if the convict do not assent to it (a).

A pardon granted on a void condition is void (b).

By the Criminal Law Act, 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28), s. 13 (c), ‘Where the King’s Majesty shall be pleased to extend his royal mercy to any offender convicted of any felony punishable with death or otherwise, and by warrant under his royal sign manual (cc), countersigned by one of his principal secretaries of state, shall grant to such offender either a free or a conditional pardon, the discharge of such offender out of custody in the case of a free pardon, and the performance of the condition in the case of a conditional pardon, shall have the effect of a pardon under the Great Seal for such offender, as to the felony for which such pardon shall be so granted : provided always, that no free pardon, nor any such discharge in consequence thereof, nor any conditional pardon, nor the performance of the condition thereof, in any of the cases aforesaid, shall prevent or mitigate the punishment to which the offender might otherwise be lawfully sentenced on a subsequent conviction for any felony committed after the granting of any such pardon.’

By the Penal Servitude Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99), s. 5, ‘Whenever His Majesty, or the lord lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland for the time being, shall be pleased to extend mercy to any offender convicted of any offence for which he may be liable to the punishment of death, upon condition of his being kept to penal servitude for any term of years, or for life, such intention of mercy shall have the same effect and may be signified in the same manner, and all courts, justices, and others shall give effect thereto and to the condition of the pardon in like manner, as in the cases where His Majesty, or the lord lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland for the time, is or are now pleased to extend mercy upon condition of transportation beyond seas, the order for the execution of such punishment as His Majesty, or the lord lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland for the time being, may have made the condition of her, his, or their mercy being substituted for the order for transportation’ (d).

The Civil Rights of Convicts Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 32), s. 3, after reciting that it is expedient to prevent all doubts respecting the civil rights of persons convicted of felonies, not capital, who have undergone the punishment to which they were adjudged, enacts that : ‘Where any offender hath been or shall be convicted of any felony not punishable with death, and hath endured or shall endure the punishment to which such offender hath been or shall be adjudged for the same, the punishment so endured hath and shall have the like effect and consequences as a pardon under the Great Seal as to the felony whereof the offender was so

Act as authority to discharge a prisoner. See 1 Leach, 74.

(d) Similar provisions as to pardon conditional on transportation are made by 5 Geo. IV. c. 84, s. 3 (not repealed, but of no present importance). That section extends to Scotland. As to Ireland, see 12 & 13 Vict. c. 27.

convicted : provided always, that nothing herein contained, nor the enduring of such punishment, shall prevent or mitigate any punishment to which the offender might otherwise be lawfully sentenced on a subsequent conviction for any other felony.'

B. Respite and Reprieve.

By respite in criminal cases is usually meant postponement of judgment or sentence till a later date (e), e.g., where a case is stated for the consideration of the Court of Criminal Appeal, or an appeal is pending under the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (f). Where judgment has been respited for a capital offence, it may be given by subsequent justices of gaol delivery for the same county (g).

By 'reprieve' is meant suspension of the execution of a sentence of death (h) : (a) ex mandato regis, in exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy ; (b) at the discretion of the Court, ex arbitrio judicis (except on conviction of murder), to enable the offender to apply for pardon or commutation of sentence (i) ; (c) ex necessitate legis, where some fact is disclosed entitling the offender to delay execution of sentence, e.g., where a woman convicted of murder is found to be pregnant (j), or where the offender becomes insane between judgment and execution (k).

Under the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, the execution of a judgment, subject to any special order, is suspended from the time of giving notice of appeal, and where an appeal is brought by leave or of right, until the appeal is determined (l).

CANADIAN NOTES.

OF PUNISHMENTS.

Sec. 1.—Death.

The offences to which the penalty of death is attached are as follows:—(a) Treason, sec. 74(2); (b) Levying War in Canada, sec. 77; (c) Piracy accompanied by violence to person, sec. 137; (d) Murder, sec. 263; (e) Rape, sec. 299.

Execution of a pregnant woman may be arrested. Code sec. 1008.

In all cases where an offender is sentenced to death, the sentence or judgment to be pronounced against him shall be that he be hanged by the neck until he be dead. Code sec. 1062.

Report of the sentence of death must forthwith be made to the Secretary of State. Code sec. 1063.

If delay after sentence be necessary, a Judge of the Court in which the conviction took place may reprieve the offender. Code sec. 1063(2).

After judgment the offender shall be separately confined. Code sec. 1064.

Only certain persons may be present at an execution. Code secs. 1066, 1067.

Judgment of death shall be carried into effect within the walls of the prison in which the offender is confined. Code sec. 1065.

A certificate of death shall be given by the medical officer. The sheriff, gaoler, and other persons present if required shall sign a declaration. Code sec. 1068.

Deputies may act for the sheriff, gaoler, or medical officer. Code sec. 1069.

An inquest shall be held within twenty-four hours. Code sec. 1070.

The body shall be buried within the walls of the prison. Code sec. 1071.

Irregularities do not make an execution illegal. Code sec. 1073.

The certificate must be sent to the Secretary of State, and printed copies exhibited at or near the principal entrance to the prison. Code sec. 1072.

Execution under Sentence of High Court.—In Cashell's case (1903), 40 C.L.J. 54 (N.W.T.), an order was made by Sifton, C.J., postponing the execution for a week, the prisoner having broken jail and escaped.

In an unreported Ontario case (Reg. v. Young (1876)) the prisoners were, on March 27, 1876, found guilty of murder and were sentenced to be hanged on June 21 following. They effected their escape, and continued at large until midsummer, and were then re-taken.

Counsel for the Crown moved before the full Court on August 27, for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari to bring up the prisoners from the jail at Cayuga, and the indictment against them, for the purpose of applying for a new sentence of death; which, on return made to the writs, was passed upon them. 40 C.L.J. 131.

The sentence may be commuted. Code sec. 1078.

Sec. 4.—Imprisonment.

The Dominion Parliament has the constitutional power to establish prisons for the incarceration of offenders against Dominion laws. Re Goodspeed (1903), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 240 (N.B.)

The Courts of a province in which is situate a penitentiary common to that and another province, should not enquire on habeas corpus into the validity of an indictment upon which the prisoner was tried in the other province and sentenced to imprisonment in such penitentiary. R. v. Wright (1905), 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 461 (N.B.).

If the certificate of sentence to imprisonment in a penitentiary is irregular for omission of the date of sentence leave may be given on a habeas corpus motion to return an amended certificate correcting the omission. R. v. Wright, 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 461.

The certified copy of sentence is sufficient warrant for the imprisonment of a convict in the penitentiary and it is not necessary that it should contain every essential averment of a formal conviction. Where the venue is mentioned in the margin of a commitment, in the case of an offence which does not require local description, it is not necessary that the warrant should describe the place where the offence was committed. A warrant of commitment (or certified copy of sentence) following a conviction on indictment, need not state the time from which the term of imprisonment shall begin to run, as both under the Penitentiaries Act and the Prisons Act, terms of imprisonment commence on and from the day of the passing of the sentence. Ex parte Smitheman (1904), 35 Can. S.C.R. 189, 490, 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 10, 17.

Where no punishment is specially provided, a person convicted of an indictable offence, is liable to imprisonment for five years. Code sec. 1052.

Everyone summarily convicted of an offence for which no punishment is specially provided is liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding ten months, with or without hard labour, or to both. Code sec. 1052(2).

Second Offence.—Everyone convicted of an indictable offence, not punishable with death, committed after previous offence, is liable to imprisonment for ten years, unless some statute directs some other punishment. Code sec. 1053.

But a person who, after a previous conviction for any indictable offence, is convicted of an offence under Part VII. of the Code for which a punishment on a first conviction is less than fourteen years' imprisonment is liable to fourteen years' imprisonment. Code sec. 465.

Where a statute of Canada imposes a fine and also imprisonment, the punishment is in the discretion of the Court, which is not bound to inflict both, but may inflict either one or the other of the two kinds of punishment by virtue of section 1028. R. v. Robidoux (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 19 (Que.)

Second Offence—Certificate of Previous Conviction, etc.—Under the Ontario Liquor License Act, R.S.O. 1897, ch. 245, sec. 101, the question of the identity of the accused, charged with a second offence, with the person previously convicted is one for the magistrate to determine upon the evidence before him apart from his personal recollection, but a certificate of the previous conviction in the same locality of a person of the same name is some evidence of identity.

A certificate under the Liquor License Act of a prior conviction thereunder is not affected by Code sec. 982, under which evidence of identity apart from and in addition to a certificate of the prior conviction is required on the trial for an indictable offence if a prior conviction of the accused is to be proved.

Per Britton, J.—Quære, whether Code sec. 982 has any application other than to the trial of indictable offences. The King v. Leach et al., 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 375.

Maximum Term Shortened.—Everyone who is liable to imprisonment for life, or for any term of years, or other term, may be sentenced to imprisonment for any shorter term; provided that no one shall be sentenced to any shorter term of imprisonment than the minimum term, if any, prescribed for the offence of which he is convicted. Code sec. 1054.

For Terms Less than Two Years.—Sentence for imprisonment for less than two years, unless some other place is named, shall be in the common gaol or place of confinement, not a penitentiary, in the place in which the sentence is pronounced. A person sentenced at the same sittings to penitentiary and gaol, or sentenced for less than two years while in a penitentiary, may be sentenced to serve in a penitentiary. In Manitoba offenders sentenced to terms of less than two years may be imprisoned in any gaol in the province. Code sec. 1056.

A prisoner convicted at the one time of two offences and sentenced on each to three months' imprisonment without specification as to the terms being concurrent or otherwise, is not entitled to a discharge on a habeas corpus after three months' imprisonment. There is no presumption that sentences passed at the one time are to be concurrent. Ex parte Bishop (1895), 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 118 (N.B.).

With or Without Hard Labour.—An offender convicted

- (a) of an indictable offence,
- (b) before a Judge of a Superior Court in Saskatchewan or Alberta; or
- (c) before a stipendiary magistrate in the North-West Territory; or
- (d) before a Judge of the Territorial Court in the Yukon Territory, may be sentenced to undergo hard labour while imprisoned, in the discretion of the Court or person passing sentence. In other cases hard labour may be imposed by the sentence if it be part of the punishment prescribed by law for the offence. Code sec. 1057.

Where the sentence imposed upon a summary trial by consent before a city stipendiary magistrate for common assault, was, in the first instance, three months' imprisonment without mention of hard labour, and the minute of adjudication did not include hard labour, a formal conviction, including hard labour, and a commitment thereon in similar terms, are invalid and the accused will be discharged on habeas corpus. Ex parte Carmichael (1903), 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 19 (N.S.).

If a statute merely directs imprisonment as the punishment of an offence, no Court of justice can, in the absence of any general discretionary power to that effect, award hard labour in addition. It is an additional substantive punishment. Hard labour is in fact a statutable addition to imprisonment, generally to be found enacted in the Act creating the offence, sometimes in statutes giving it as a discretionary power to a Court on awarding imprisonment. R. v. Frawley (1881), 46 U.C.Q.B. 153; R. v. Allbright, 9 P.R. (Ont.) 25.

Imprisonment in Default, with Hard Labour.—Section 739(2) of Revised Criminal Code authorizes the imposition of hard labour upon an imprisonment in default of distress, only where imprisonment with hard labour in the first instance might have been imposed in addition to a fine with imprisonment in default of distress or payment. The King v. Riley, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 346.

Sec. 5.—Whipping.

The punishment of whipping may be imposed upon persons convicted of the following offences:—

- (a) Assault upon the King.—Code sec. 80.
- (b) Burglary When Armed.—Code sec. 457.
- (c) Carnal Knowledge of a Girl under Fourteen Years of Age.—Code sec. 301.
- (d) Attempt to Have Carnal Knowledge of a Girl under Fourteen Years of Age.—Code sec. 302.

(e) Attempts to Choke, Strangle, or Drug with Intent to Commit or Assist in Committing an Indictable Offence.—Code sec. 276.

(f) Indecent Assaults upon Females.—Code sec. 292.

(g) Assaults upon Persons with Intent to Commit Sodomy or Indecent Assaults on Male Persons by Other Male Persons.—Code sec. 293.

(x) Doing, Attempting or Procuring Acts of Gross Indecency by a Male Person with Another Male Person.—Code sec. 206.

Provisions for the Carrying into Effect of the Punishment of Whipping.—The instrument is a cat-o'-nine-tails unless the sentence prescribes some other instrument. Whipping may be three times inflicted. It shall not take place within ten days of discharge. Code sec. 1060.

Females.—Whipping shall not be inflicted on any female. Code sec. 1061.

Sec. 6.—Fines.

The amount of a fine is in the discretion of the Court, within the limits fixed by statute. Code sec. 1029.

On conviction of an indictable offence punishable by imprisonment for five years or less, a fine may be imposed in addition to or in lieu of any punishment otherwise authorized; and the sentence may direct imprisonment till the fine is paid, or for not more than five years. Code sec. 1035(1).

On conviction for an indictable offence punishable with imprisonment for more than five years, a fine may be imposed in addition to, but not in lieu of, any punishment otherwise ordered. In the latter case also imprisonment in default of payment of the fine may be directed by the sentence. Code sec. 1035(2). It should be noticed that the exercise of the power given by this section of the Code is not expressed to be subject to the provisions of any other statute.

Penalties and forfeitures, when no other mode is prescribed, are recoverable, with costs, by civil action at the suit of His Majesty or of a private party suing for His Majesty and for himself. Where no other provision is made, one moiety belongs to His Majesty, and the other to the party suing. Code sec. 1038. Actions for penalties must be brought within two years, except it be otherwise provided. Code sec. 1141.

One moiety goes to the person who sues in respect of the following offences:—

(a) Uttering Uncurrent Coin.—Sec. 567.

(b) Possession of Copper Coin Unlawfully Imported or Manufactured.—Sec. 624.

(c) Unlawfully Manufacturing or Importing Copper Coin.—Sec. 625.

(d) Attempted Illegal Importation of Copper Coin.—Sec. 626.

(e) Persuading to Desert the Army or Navy, or Concealing a Deserter.—Sec. 82.

(f) Resisting Search Warrant for Deserter.—Secs. 83 and 657.

(g) Receiving Stolen Goods from Soldiers.—Sec. 438.

(h) Receiving Necessaries from Seamen.—Sec. 439.

(i) Cruelty to Animals.—Sec. 542.

(j) Keeping Cockpit.—Sec. 543.

The Governor in Council may at any time remit any fine or forfeiture. Code sec. 1084.

The remission may be on terms as to the payment of costs or otherwise; provided that where proceedings have been instituted by private persons costs already incurred shall not be remitted. Code sec. 1085.

Sec. 7.—Recognizances and Sureties.

A person convicted summarily of an indictable offence, or by any Court for any offence not punishable with death, may be required in addition to any other sentence to enter into his own recognizances or to give security to keep the peace and be of good behaviour, for a term not exceeding two years, and to imprisonment for not more than one year, pending the entry into recognizances or giving security. Code sec. 1058.

It is noteworthy that recognizances or sureties are alternative under section 1058, and that there is power to impose either in addition to, but not in lieu of, any other punishment, contrary in both respects to the provisions enacted in each of the Consolidation Acts of 1861 (British), referred to in page 219 hereof.

A person charged before a justice with an offence punishable on summary conviction (under Part XV. of the Code), or with making threats, may, in addition to, or in lieu of, any other sentence, be ordered to enter into recognizances, or to give security to keep the peace, and be of good behaviour for a period not exceeding twelve months, and in default to imprisonment for not more than twelve months. Code sec. 748,

In this section also the power to order recognizances or security is alternative only.

Part XXI. of the Code treats of “Render by Sureties and Recognizances.”

An application in Nova Scotia under Code sec. 1110 to discharge from custody a surety arrested in estreat proceedings should be made to the Judge presiding in criminal sittings and not to the Court en banc. Re Pippy, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 305.

Sec. 8.—Probation of Offenders.

The Ticket of Leave Act, R.S.C. (1906), ch. 150, enacts that the Governor-General may grant to any convict in a penitentiary, gaol, or other public or reformatory prison a license to be at large in Canada, or in a specified part thereof, and may revoke such license. Sec. 2.

The conviction and sentence remain in force despite such license, but the convict is not liable to imprisonment by reason of his sentence while the license remains in force. Sec. 3.

If a holder of a license is convicted of an indictable offence his license is forfeited forthwith. Sec. 5.

If a holder of a license is convicted of any offence punishable on summary conviction the license may be revoked. Sec. 6.

The license issued under the authority of 62-63-Vict. ch. 49, and by which a convict while undergoing a term of imprisonment in penitentiary is conditionally allowed at large, may be revoked by the Governor-General either with or without cause assigned.

The revocation by the Crown, without cause assigned, of such license works no interruption in the running of the sentence which shall terminate at the same time as if such license had never been granted. R. v. Johnson, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 178.

If a license be revoked or forfeited the holder may be apprehended (sec. 7(1)) and recommitted to the place from which he was released by his license (sec. 7(3)), unless this be in another province, and he may be imprisoned where apprehended. Sec. 7(3).

In the event of a license being revoked or forfeited, the term to which the offender was originally sentenced must be served out in the kind of institution to which he was originally sentenced. Sec. 8.

A licensee must notify the proper officials of the place in which he resides of his place of residence, and whenever he is about to leave that place. Sec. 9.

Every male holder of a license must once in each month report himself to the Chief of Police or sheriff of the city, town, county or district in which such holder may be, and such report may be required to be made personally or by letter. Sec. 9(2).

Any person who cannot satisfy the Court that his delay in failing to notify his place of residence or to report was unavoidable, is guilty of an offence, and liable on summary conviction to forfeit his license, or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding one year. Sec. 10.

Any holder failing whenever required to produce his license, or who breaks any of the other conditions of his license by any act which is not of itself punishable either upon indictment or summary conviction, is guilty of an offence, and liable upon summary conviction to imprisonment for three months with or without hard labour. Sec. 11.

Any peace officer may take into custody without warrant any convict who is the holder of such license—

(a) Whom he reasonably suspects of having committed any offence, or

(b) If it appears to such peace officer that such convict is getting his livelihood by dishonest means, and may take him before a justice to be dealt with according to law.

2. If it appears from the facts proved before the justice that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the convict so brought before him is getting his livelihood by dishonest means, such convict shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and his license shall be forfeited.

3. Any convict so brought before a justice of the peace may be convicted of getting his livelihood by dishonest means, although he has been brought before the justice on some other charge, or not in the manner provided for in this section. Sec. 12.

Conditional Release (Suspended Sentence).—Sentence may be suspended in the discretion of the Court in any case in which an offender suffers a first conviction for an offence punishable with not more than two years' imprisonment; with the consent of counsel for the Crown in the prosecution, sentence may also be suspended after conviction for offences punishable with imprisonment for more than two years. Code sec. 1081.

The Court shall be satisfied that the offender has a fixed place of abode or regular occupation. Code sec. 1082. The offender may be apprehended, brought before the Court or a justice, committed and tried for his conduct subsequent to release. Code sec. 1083.

Where a release on suspended sentence was in respect of a conviction for keeping a disorderly house, the fact that the accused had again been brought before the same magistrate on a similar charge which, however, was not substantiated, does not give the magistrate jurisdiction to impose the sentence which had been suspended in respect of the first charge. And, semble, a proceeding under sec. 1083 to bring up for sentence an accused person who had been released on suspended sentence, can only be taken at the instance of the Crown. R. v. Siteman (1902), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 224.

Where the jury convicted the defendant and the verdict was recorded and the offender was, by order of the Court, released on bail to appear for judgment, it is only upon motion by the Crown that the recognizance of the defendant and his bail can be estreated in Ontario or that judgment can be moved against the offender. R. v. Young (1901), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 580 (Ont.).

A contract by the accused to indemnify a surety against liability under his recognizance is illegal; but where a deposit of money is made by the accused with the surety by way of indemnity, the accused cannot recover it back. Herman v. Jeuchner, 15 Q.B.D. 561.

Where after a summary trial the accused is convicted but is released on suspended sentence and a recognizance is taken binding the accused to keep the peace and be of good behaviour, the magistrate has no jurisdiction to impose sentence without an information under oath charging a breach of the recognizance (Code sec. 1083). R. v. Siteman (1902), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 224 (N.S.).

Two Years' Imprisonment.—In R. v. McLennan (No. 1) (1905), 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 1, it appears to have been considered that an offence “punishable with not more than two years’ imprisonment” under the first sub-section meant an offence so punishable before the Court or magistrate actually trying the charge. It is submitted that the section refers to the maximum penalty which the law imposes for the offence, although the magistrate exercising a power of summary trial may on account of the special jurisdiction conferred on him be restricted to a sentence less than two years, and that where such maximum exceeds two years the concurrence of the Crown counsel is necessary under sub-sec. (2). See note 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 10-13.

“Court.”—The “Court” in sec. 1081 means, unless the context otherwise requires, any superior Court of criminal jurisdiction, any Judge or Court exercising the “speedy trials” jurisdiction and any magistrate exercising the “summary trials” jurisdiction. Code sec. 1026.

Juveniles.—There is also the power under the “juvenile offenders” clauses (Code secs. 800-821), to dismiss the accused if the justices upon the hearing of a case against a juvenile offender under sixteen years of age, consider it inexpedient to inflict any punishment. Code sec. 813.

Costs.—Where the person convicted upon a summary trial is released upon suspended sentence and is directed to pay the informant’s costs, such costs are payable forthwith unless otherwise ordered. The power under this section to award such costs to be paid “within such period and by such instalments as the Court directs” does not make it necessary to divide the costs into instalments. R. v. McLellan (No. 1) (1905), 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 1.

Previous Conviction.—The proper time for taking evidence of a previous conviction to exclude a magistrate’s jurisdiction to release on suspended sentence is after the finding of guilty on the present charge and not during the hearing of the charge. If the Crown does not adduce evidence of a previous conviction, the magistrate may, on his own initiative, call for the records under his own control and custody and hold an enquiry upon the question whether the defendant had been previously convicted before him and on the questions of identity, age and antecedents of the defendant for the purpose of considering the appropriate punishment or a release on suspended sentence where the latter is permissible. Semble, if the magistrate recollects that the person convicted before him was previously convicted before him he should proceed with such an enquiry, although the Crown counsel was content to allow the accused to go on suspended sentence. The King v. Bonnevie, 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 376.

Sec. 9.—Punishment of Juvenile Offenders.

The Prisons and Reformatories Act, R.S.C. (1906) ch. 148, provides for the separation, before trial, while in custody, of young persons apparently under sixteen years from older persons in custody, and from all persons undergoing imprisonment.

By section 29 it is provided that offenders whose age does not exceed sixteen years, who are convicted summarily or otherwise, of an offence punishable by imprisonment for not more than five years, may be sentenced to imprisonment in any reformatory prison in the province in which the conviction takes place, provided that the sentence may in no case be less than two or more than five years. The prisoners in reformatories (whether sentenced to hard labour or otherwise) are liable to perform labour.

Ontario.—Part 2 of the last named Act applies to the Province of Ontario only. It is provided that any boy apparently under sixteen convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment for a period of three months or longer (but not exceeding five years), may be sentenced to imprisonment in a certified industrial school, for a fixed term, and also to be kept there for an indefinite term, provided that the whole period of detention shall not exceed five years. Sec. 49.

It is further provided that if a boy apparently under sixteen years has been sentenced and committed to the common gaol for a period not less than fourteen days, a Judge of a superior or county Court may sentence such boy to be sent forthwith or at the expiration of his term in gaol to a certified industrial school for an indefinite term, not exceeding five years from the commencement of his imprisonment in the common gaol. Sec. 50.

Boys of thirteen years of age or under may be transferred from a reformatory or common gaol to a certified industrial school, by warrant of the Governor-General (with the consent of the Provincial Secretary). This applies whether the boy has been tried summarily or otherwise. Sec. 51.

Any boy of thirteen or under convicted either summarily or otherwise of an offence punishable by imprisonment may be sentenced to imprisonment in an industrial school for not more than five years, nor less than two years, provided that he cannot be detained beyond the age of seventeen years. Sec. 52.

Every boy sentenced or transferred to a certified industrial school shall be detained there until the end of his fixed term (unless sooner discharged by lawful authority), and (subject to the laws and regulations) for a period not to exceed five years from the commencement of his imprisonment. Sec. 53.

Any girl who at the time of her trial appears to the Court to be under the age of fourteen years, and who is convicted of any offence for which a sentence of imprisonment for a term of one month or longer, but less than five years, may be imposed upon an adult convicted of the like offence, may be sentenced to the Industrial Refuge for Girls of Ontario, for such fixed term as the Court thinks fit, not being greater than the term of imprisonment which could be imposed upon an adult for the like offence, and may be further sentenced to an indefinite fixed term, provided that the whole term of confinement in the Industrial Refuge shall not exceed five years from the commencement of her imprisonment. Sec. 62.

Any girl apparently under the age of fourteen years who is convicted of an offence punishable by law on summary conviction, and sentenced and committed to any common gaol, for a term not less than fourteen days, may be sentenced by a Judge of a superior or county Court to be sent forthwith or at the end of her term in such gaol to the Industrial Refuge for Girls of Ontario, to be detained for an indefinite period, not exceeding in the whole five years from the commencement of her imprisonment in the common gaol. Sec. 63.

A boy in the industrial school, or a girl in the Industrial Refuge for Girls, may be bound an apprentice to an approved person, for a term not to extend beyond five years from the commencement of his or her imprisonment; and thereupon may be discharged on probation. Sec. 65.

Any child apparently under the age of fourteen years, convicted summarily or otherwise of an offence, may be committed to any home for destitute or neglected children or to the charge of any approved children's aid society. Sec. 67.

When information or complaint is made against a boy under the age of twelve years, or girl under the age of thirteen years, for an offence punishable on summary conviction or otherwise, the Court or justice shall notify the executive officer of the children's aid society, and may notify parents or friends. Sec. 68. After consultation with the officer and hearing the complaint, the Court or justice may, by order,

(a) Authorize the said officer to take the child, and, under the provisions of the law of Ontario, bind the child out to some suitable person until the child has attained the age of twenty-one years, or any less age; or

(b) Place the child out in some approved foster-home; or

(c) Impose a fine not exceeding ten dollars; or

(d) Suspend sentence for a definite or for an indefinite period; or

(e) If the child has been found guilty of the offence charged, or is shewn to be wilfully wayward and unmanageable, commit the child to a certified industrial school, or to the Ontario Reformatory for Boys, or to the Refuge for Girls, as the case may be, and in such cases, the report of the said officer shall be attached to the warrant of commitment. Sec. 68.

Except in the case of children cared for in a shelter or temporary home under an Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to and the better Protection of Children, 56 Vict. ch. 45 (Ontario), in a municipality having but one children's aid society, no Protestant may be committed to the care of a Roman Catholic society or placed in a Roman Catholic family, nor any Roman Catholic children be committed to the care of a Protestant society, or placed in a Protestant family, under secs. 67, 68 and 69. Sec. 70.

Quebec.—Part III. of the Prisons and Reformatories Act, R.S.C. (1906) ch. 148, applies only to the Province of Quebec. Sec. 78.

Every person apparently under the age of sixteen years, convicted before any Court of criminal jurisdiction, or any Judge of sessions of the peace, recorder, district or police magistrate, of any offence for which he would be liable to imprisonment, may be sentenced to be detained in a certified reformatory school for a term not less than two, nor more than five years, or to be first imprisoned in a common gaol for not more than three months, and thereafter to be sent to a certified reformatory school to be detained for not less than two, and not more than five years. Sec. 79.

An offender detained in a reformatory under summary conviction may be discharged by the Lieutenant-Governor. Sec. 80.

Persons apparently under the age of sixteen years arrested on a charge of having committed any offence not capital, shall not, while awaiting trial, be detained in the common gaol, but in a certified reformatory school if there be any within three miles of such gaol, and if there be more than one such school within such distance, the person detained shall be placed in that school conducted most nearly in accordance with the religious belief to which his parents belong, or in which he has been educated. Sec. 81.

Every offender detained in a certified reformatory school who wilfully neglects and refuses to conform to the rules thereof shall be imprisoned with hard labour for a term not exceeding three months, on summary conviction before a justice of the peace, and at the end of such term of imprisonment, he shall be brought back to the reformatory school to be detained for the portion of the term to which he was originally sentenced which remained unexpired at the time he was sent to the prison. Sec. 82.

(Note.—The four last preceding sections seem to apply to both males and females, though they occur in Part III. of the statute under the sub-title "Reformatory Schools for Boys.")

Nova Scotia.—Part IV. of the aforesaid Act applies only to the Province of Nova Scotia. Sec. 89.

A Protestant boy apparently under the age of sixteen years convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment may be sentenced to the Halifax Industrial School, for a term not more than five or less than one year. Sec. 90 (amended in 1908). Such boy must be instructed in reading, writing and arithmetic, and in one of the trades or occupations taught in the school. Sec. 92.

A Roman Catholic boy apparently under the age of sixteen years convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment may be sentenced to the St. Patrick's Home at Halifax, for a term not exceeding five or less than one year. Sec. 93 (amended in 1908). Such boy must be instructed in reading, writing and arithmetic, and in one of the trades or occupations taught in the home. Sec. 96.

A boy sentenced to be detained in the home may be licensed to be at large in the province, or in such part thereof as the license may specify. Sec. 97.

A boy upon contravention of any of the conditions of his license may be remitted to the home to serve the remainder of his original sentence, with such additional term, not exceeding one year, as may seem proper. Sec. 97(4).

Any Roman Catholic girl apparently under the age of eighteen years convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment may be sentenced to the Good Shepherd Industrial Refuge, for a term not exceeding five or less than two years (sec. 105), with the written consent of the Superintendent of the Refuge, and after provision has been made by the municipality within which the conviction has taken place for the support of the girl so sentenced (sec. 106), and each girl sentenced and detained must be instructed in reading, writing and arithmetic, and in one of the trades or occupations taught in the Refuge. Sec. 107.

Girls so sentenced may be apprenticed to approved Roman Catholic persons for a term not exceeding five years from the commencement of the girl's imprisonment, and upon such apprenticeship taking place the girl shall be discharged from the Refuge on probation. Sec. 108.

A girl sentenced to be detained in a Refuge may be licensed to be at large in the province or in any specified part thereof, and upon contravention of the conditions of the license may be remitted to the Refuge to serve the remainder of her original sentence, with such additional term as may seem proper, not exceeding one year. Sec. 112.

New Brunswick.—Part V. of the above mentioned Act applies only to the Province of New Brunswick.

Boys apparently under the age of sixteen years may be sentenced to the Industrial Home for Boys for fixed and for indefinite terms, the whole period not to exceed five years. Sec. 116. There are provisions for the transfer of boys under sixteen from the common jails to the home (sec. 117), and from Dorchester Penitentiary (sec. 125); for the apprenticeship of boys (sec. 121); for their discharge absolutely or on probation (sec. 123), and for their recommittal. Sec. 124.

Imprisonment of Females.

There is no general statutory provision for the imprisonment of females, except for the separation from male prisoners in penitentiaries, but special and varying provisions are made concerning them in respect of certain provinces by the Prisons and Reformatories Act, R.S.C. (1906) ch. 148.

In Ontario a female, convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment in the common gaol for two months or more, may be sentenced to the Andrew Mercer Reformatory for Females (sec. 55), or if confined to the common gaol, may be transferred to the Reformatory. Sec. 56. A female convicted of being a loose, idle or disorderly, or vagrant person, under sec. 239 of the Code, or under Part XVI. of the Code (Summary Trial for Indictable Offences), may be sentenced to the Reformatory, for any term less than two years, without a fine if the term be more than six months, in substitution for the punishments otherwise provided. Sec. 57. Females sentenced to imprisonment in common gaols, or confined therein, by a police magistrate of a city, may be committed or transferred to a House of Refuge for Females (sec. 71), and may be transferred to a House of Refuge. Sec. 72.

In Nova Scotia, every Roman Catholic female above the age of sixteen years, convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment in a city prison or common gaol for two months or more, may be sentenced to extended or substituted imprisonment in the Good Shepherd Reformatory at Halifax, if under the age of twenty-one years until she become twenty-one, or for not less than two, or more than four years; if twenty-one years or upward, for not less than one, or more than two years. Sec. 98. A female aged more than sixteen, confined in a city prison or common gaol may be transferred to the Reformatory. Sec. 99. A female Roman Catholic, convicted of being a loose, idle or disorderly person, or vagrant, or summarily for an indictable offence, under Part XVI. of the Code, may be sentenced to the Reformatory for a term less than two years, in substitution for the punishments otherwise provided for. Sec. 100. Persons in the Reformatory may be transferred to a city prison or common gaol. Sec. 103.

In New Brunswick, every Roman Catholic girl, convicted of certain specified offences, may be sentenced to the Good Shepherd Reformatory for a term less than two years. Secs. 127, 128.

Trial of Juvenile Offenders.—The trial of persons apparently under the age of sixteen years must take place without publicity, and separate from the trials of other accused persons. Code sec. 644.

The trial of offenders whose age does not, apparently, exceed sixteen years, for indictable offences, is provided for by Part XVII. of the Code, secs. 800-821. This part does not apply in British Columbia or Prince Edward Island to any offence punishable by imprisonment for two years and upwards. Code sec. 801.

A person whose age does not, in the opinion of the justice before whom he is brought, exceed sixteen years of age, shall upon conviction before two justices of theft, or an offence punishable as theft, be committed to imprisonment in the common gaol or other place of confinement, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding three months, or shall pay a fine not exceeding twenty dollars, as the justices may adjudge. Code sec. 802.

The jurisdiction to try, and to sentence a juvenile for any offence within sec. 802, is given irrespective of the value of the thing stolen. Under this Part of the Code, however, which relates wholly to juvenile offenders, he has the right to elect to be tried by a jury, and, in that event, he could not be tried summarily.

The power of determining the age or apparent age of the accused is given exclusively to the justice; and a conviction will not be held bad for the omission to state that the accused is under the age of sixteen years. R. v. Quinn (1900), 36 Can. Law Jour. 644 (N.S.).

If the charge be of an offence over which, if the offence charged be true in fact, the magistrate has jurisdiction, the magistrate's jurisdiction cannot be made to depend upon the truth or falsehood of the facts, or upon the evidence being sufficient or insufficient to establish the corpus delicti brought under investigation. Cave v. Mountain, 1 M. & G. 257. And on a habeas corpus to which a proper commitment in execution is returned, the Court never enters into the question whether the magistrate has drawn the right conclusion from the evidence, when there was evidence. R. v. Munro (1864), 24 U.C.Q.B. 44.

Part XVII. of the Code does not enable two or more justices in Ontario to sentence to imprisonment in a reformatory in that province. Code sec. 803. Nor does Part XVI. prevent the summary conviction of offenders liable under other Parts of the Code. Code sec. 804.

Juvenile Courts.—An Act respecting Juvenile Delinquents, 7 & 8 Edw. VII. ch. 40, was assented to 20th July, 1908. It goes into force in any province, city, town or other part of a province on proclamation in the Canada Gazette (sec. 36). It provides for the trial of persons under sixteen years of age by Juvenile Courts specially authorized. Where such a Court exists it has exclusive jurisdiction in delinquency, except where, in the case of children apparently over fourteen years, the Juvenile Court orders that the accused shall be tried by indictment (secs. 4 and 7). Trials are summary. Sec. 5.

Sec. 13.—Punishments.

General Rules as to Punishments.—No person shall be deemed guilty or liable to punishment until duly convicted. Code sec. 1027.

Everyone who is convicted of any offence not punishable with death, shall be punished in the manner, if any, prescribed by the statute especially relating to such offence. Code sec. 1051.

Felonies and Misdemeanours.—The distinction between felony and misdemeanour is abolished, and proceedings in respect of all indictable offences, except so far as they are herein varied, shall be conducted in the same manner. Code sec. 14.

Larceny after Previous Conviction.—See the following Code section: Stealing dogs, etc., sec. 370; stealing trees, etc., sec. 374; stealing plants, etc., sec. 375(2), sec. 376(2); stealing fence, etc., sec. 377; stealing things not otherwise provided for, sec. 386(2).

Larceny after Two Previous Convictions.—See the following Code sections: Stealing trees, etc., sec. 374; stealing plants, etc., sec. 375(2), sec. 376(2); stealing fences, etc., sec. 377; stealing things not otherwise provided for, sec. 386(2).

Punishment of Principal in the Second Degree and Accessories.—Principals in the second degree and accessories before the fact are parties to the offence; there is now no distinction. Code sec. 71.

For punishment of accessories after the fact, see murder, sec. 267; indictable offences punishable by imprisonment for life or more than fourteen years, sec. 574; other cases, sec. 575.

Degrees of Punishment.—An offender liable to different degrees or kinds of punishment may be punished as the Court before which he is convicted may decide. Code sec. 1028.

Fine or Penalty.—When a fine or penalty may be imposed, the amount thereof, subject to any specially defined limitations, shall be in the discretion of the Court passing sentence. Code sec. 1029.

Cumulative Punishment.—When an offender is convicted of more offences than one, before the same Court or person at the same sitting, or when any offender, under sentence or undergoing punishment for one offence is convicted of any other offence, the Court or person passing sentence may, on the last conviction, direct that the sentences passed upon the offender for his several offences shall take effect one after another. Code sec. 1055.

A prisoner convicted at the one time of two offences and sentenced on each to three months' imprisonment without specification as to the terms being concurrent or otherwise, is not entitled to a discharge on a habeas corpus after three months' imprisonment. There is no presumption that sentences passed at the one time are to be concurrent. Ex parte Bishop, 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 118 (N.B.).

When Offence Punishable under More than One Act or Law.
—Where an act or omission constitutes an offence, punishable on summary conviction or on indictment, under two or more Acts, or both under an Act and at common law, the offender shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of such Acts, or at common law, but shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same offence. Code sec. 15.

When a statute makes that unlawful which was lawful before, and appoints a specific remedy, that remedy may be pursued and no other; and where an offence is not so at common law, but made an offence by Act of Parliament, an indictment will lie where there is a substantive prohibitory clause in such Act of Parliament, though there be afterwards a particular provision and a particular remedy. When a new offence is created by an Act of Parliament, and a penalty is annexed to it by a separate and substantive clause, it is not necessary for the prosecutor to sue for the penalty, but he may proceed on the prior clause, on the ground of its being an indictable offence. R. v. Mason (1867), 17 U.C.C.P. 534.

In order to be a bar the issue in the second proceeding must be identical with that in the first one, although the facts may vary, and although the charges formulated may not be the same. R. v. King (1897), 1 Q.B. 214; see notes in 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 497.

Parliament never intended to repeal the common law, except in so far as the Code either expressly or by implication repeals it. So that if the facts stated in the indictment constitute an indictable offence at common law, and that offence is not dealt with in the Code, then unquestionably an indictment will lie at common law; even if the offence has been dealt with in the Code, but merely by way of statement of what is law, then both are in force. Union Colliery Co. v. The Queen, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 400 (Can.), per Sedgewick, J.

The Criminal Code of 1892 was intended to make complete and exhaustive provision as to the subjects with which it deals, in so far as all events as its provisions relate to procedure. It is explicitly called a Code by the first section of the chapter in which it is embodied and its utility as a Code will be greatly impaired if it cannot be so considered. R. v. Snelgrove (1906), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 189. See also the Vagliano Case, [1891] 1 A.C., at p. 144.

Where a person has been acquitted by a Court of competent jurisdiction the acquittal is a bar to all further proceedings to punish him for the same matter, although a plea of autrefois acquit may not be allowed because of the different nature of the charges. The acquittal on the first charge became res judicata as between the Crown and the accused, and it was not open to the Crown to proceed on the second charge in which a conviction could only be had by the second jury overruling the contrary verdict of the first jury. R. v. Quinn, 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 412, 11 O.L.R. 242.

Sec. 14.—Obsolete Punishments.

Outlawry in Criminal Cases.—Code sec. 1030.

Solitary Confinement and the Pillory.—Code sec. 1031.

Sec. 15.—Civil Effects of Conviction.

Forfeiture of any chattels which have moved to or caused the death of any human being, in respect of such death (Code sec. 1032), and attainder or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture or escheat (Code sec. 1033) have been abolished.

Sec. 16.—Pardon or Remission of Punishment.

The Crown may extend the royal mercy to any person sentenced to imprisonment by virtue of any statute, although such person is imprisoned for non-payment of money to some other person than the Crown. Code sec. 1076.

The Crown may commute the sentence of death passed upon any person convicted of a capital offence to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, or for any term of years not less than two years, or to imprisonment in any gaol or other place of confinement for any period less than two years, with or without hard labour. Code sec. 1077.

No free pardon, nor any discharge in consequence thereof, nor any conditional pardon, nor the performance of the condition thereof, in any of the cases aforesaid, shall prevent or mitigate the punishment to which the offender might otherwise be lawfully sentenced on a subsequent conviction for any offence other than that for which the pardon was granted. Code sec. 1076(3).

When an offender has been convicted of an offence not punishable with death, and has endured the punishment adjudged, or has been convicted of an offence punishable with death and the sentence of death has been commuted, and the offender has endured the punishment to which his sentence was commuted, the punishment so endured shall, as to the offence whereof the offender was so convicted, have the like effect and consequences as a pardon under the great seal. Code sec. 1078.

When any person convicted of any offence has paid the sum adjudged to be paid, together with costs, if any, under such conviction, or has received a remission thereof from the Crown, or has suffered the imprisonment awarded for non-payment thereof, or the imprisonment awarded in the first instance, or has been discharged from his conviction by the justice in any case in which such justice may discharge such person, he shall be released from all further or other criminal proceedings for the same cause. Code sec. 1079.

His Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy is not limited by the statutory provisions. Code sec. 1080.

No civil remedy for any act or omission shall be suspended or affected by reason that such act or omission amounts to a criminal offence. Code sec. 13.

This section (formerly section 534 of the Criminal Code, 1892), has been held in Quebec not to be "criminal law" legislation, but legislation dealing with civil rights and therefore ultra vires of the Federal Parliament. Paquet v. Lavoie (1898), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 314, 7 Que. Q.B. 277.

To an action, before the Code, for assault and battery defendant pleaded that before action brought the plaintiff laid an information before a magistrate charging defendant with feloniously, etc., wounding the plaintiff with intent to do him grievous bodily harm, thereby charging defendant with felony; that defendant was brought before the magistrate and committed for trial which had not yet taken place; that the subject of both the civil and criminal prosecutions was the same, and that plaintiff's civil right of action was suspended until the criminal charge was disposed of. Held, on demurrer, that the plea was good; and an order was made staying the civil action in the meantime. Taylor v. McCulloch (1885), 8 Ont. R. 309.

The former rule, excepting in the Province of Quebec, was that on grounds of public policy if it appeared on the trial of a civil action that the facts amounted to felony, the Judge was bound to stop the civil proceedings and nonsuit the plaintiff in order that public justice might first be vindicated by a criminal prosecution. Walsh v. Nattress, 19 U.C.C.P. 453; Livingstone v. Massey, 23 U.C.Q.B. 156; Williams v. Robinson, 20 U.C.C.P. 255; Pease v. McAloon, 1 Kerr (N.B.) 111. The civil remedy was held to be suspended until the defendant charged with the felony should be either acquitted or convicted thereof. Brown v. Dalby, 7 U.C.Q.B. 162.

The act of pardoning is one of pure clemency and is not the exercise of a judicial power; it is purely and essentially the exercise of a royal prerogative which is exercised by the Sovereign himself or in his dominions beyond the seas by his representative under a special delegation of power. This delegation, in the case of the Governor-General, is contained in the royal instruction, but if the King saw fit a delegation of this power could be given to any Lieutenant-Governor for matters under the legislative jurisdiction of his province. Todd's Parliamentary Government in British Colonies, page 254.

The prerogative of mercy is simply the exercise of a discretion on the part of the Sovereign to dispense with or to modify the punishments which the criminal or penal law require to be inflicted.

It is exercised by commutation or by a free or conditional pardon. Ex parte Armitage, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 345.

Letters patent containing permanent instructions for the exercise of the duties and powers of the Governor-General of Canada were issued on the 5th October, 1878. These letters patent specially authorize and empower the Governor-General for the time being, in the name and on behalf of the Sovereign, to grant to any offender convicted of any crime in any Court, or before any Judge, justice or magistrate within the Dominion a pardon should he see occasion, or a respite of the execution of the sentence of any such offender, for such period as he may see fit, and to remit any fines, penalties or forfeitures which may become due or payable to the Crown, provided that the Governor-General should not pardon or reprieve any such offender without first receiving in capital cases the advice of the Privy Council and in other cases the advice of one at least of his ministers. The royal mercy may be extended to a person who is imprisoned for the non-payment of a penalty which belongs to a person other than the Crown. This rule was established by sec. 125 of the statute 32-33 Vict. ch. 29, the provision is reproduced in sec. 1076 of the Code. Ex parte Armitage, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 345.

The power of commuting and remitting sentences for offences against the laws of the Province of Ontario, or offences over which the legislative authority of the province extends, which by the terms of the Act 51 Vict. ch. 5 (Ont.) is included in the powers which were vested in or exercisable by the Governors or Lieutenant-Governors of the several provinces before Confederation, and which are now by that act vested in and exercisable by the Lieutenant-Governor of this province, does not affect offences against criminal laws which are the subject of Dominion legislation, but refers only to offences within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature, and in that sense the Ontario statute is intra vires the provincial legislation. Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, 19 Ont. App. 31, 23 S.C.R. 458. See note 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 354.

Fines imposed under the Montreal City Charter belong to the Crown as represented by the Governor of the Province of Quebec and of the City of Montreal, and the city has no power to remit the same. Semble, the pardoning power is an exercise of the royal prerogative and unless a statute expressly limits such prerogative the same is to be exercised by the Sovereign or his representative (in Canada by the Governor-General) acting under a special delegation of power from the Sovereign, and the remission of a penalty under a provincial statute for default in payment whereof the accused is undergoing imprisonment is an exercise of the pardoning power. R. v. Armitage, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 345.

In the matter of pardons of convicts in the penitentiaries, gaols, prisons and reformatories, the application for clemency should be prepared in the form of a petition addressed to His Excellency the Governor-General, stating the age and name of the prisoner or convict, the name of the Judge or magistrate who tried or sentenced him, crime committed and date of sentence, term of imprisonment, where incarcerated, and reasons for seeking the clemency of the Crown.

This petition should be forwarded to the Secretary of State at Ottawa or to the Departments of Justice and signed by one or more persons, with any documentary evidence or letter regarding the previous character of the prisoner. The papers are subsequently laid with the advice of the Minister of Justice before His Excellency the Governor-General, whose pleasure is communicated by the Secretary of State to the parties interested and to the warden of the penitentiary or keeper of the gaol, as the case may be.

In case of death sentence the Judge, after sentencing the prisoner, forwards, under sec. 1063 of the Code, a copy of the evidence, and his report to the Secretary of the State. Any application for the commutation of the sentence should be addressed to His Excellency the Governor-General in Council through the Secretary of State, in the form of a petition setting forth reasons for such application. This application is referred to the Minister of Justice and is submitted by him, with his recommendation to the Governor-General in Council, whose pleasure is communicated to the interested parties by the Secretary of State.

BOOK THE SECOND.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO THE LAW OF NATIONS.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF PIRACY.

SECT. I.—OF PIRACY JURE GENTIUM.

IT is necessary to distinguish between piracy jure gentium (or as it is sometimes styled, piracy at common law) (a) and the forms of piracy created by municipal legislation (b). 'Piracy *jure gentium*¹ is only a sea term for robbery, piracy being a robbery within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty (c). . . . If the mariners of any ship shall violently dispossess the master, and shall afterwards carry away the ship or any of

(a) In the 6th edition of this work (Vol. i. p. 260 n), it was said that 'a fallacy seems to run through some of our books in saying that piracy was not felony at common law. This arose from such expressions as that it was a crime of which the common law did not take notice or cognisance, i.e. which was not triable by jury, the common-law mode of trial. See 2 Hale, 18, 372. 1 Hale, 355. Lord Coke says it was felony, Co. Litt. 391a. 3 Co. Inst. 112. 13 Co. Rep. 51. In 40 Ass. Pl. 25, p. 245, a case of piracy is mentioned where a Norman captain was attainted of felony and hanged. See this case stated 3 Co. Inst. 21, and 1 Hale, 100.' C. S. G. This opinion was stated by the late Sir R. S. Wright to be inaccurate (see Parl. Pap. 1878, H. L. 178, Report on Piracy Statutes). Piracy is distinguished from felony in 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, ss. 1, 2, 3.

AMERICAN NOTE.

In the United States the law relating to Piracy is contained in Acts of Congress. U. S. Statt. Rev. ss. 5368–5375. Robbery on the high seas is piracy both by the laws of nations and by the Acts of Congress. U. S. v. Furlong, 5 Wheat. 164. As to mutiny on board ship, see U. S. v. Sharp, 1 Peters, C. C. 122; U. S. v. Bladen, ibid. 213; U. S. v. Gardiner, 5 Mason, 402; U. S. v. Kelly, 4 Wash. C. C. 528. As to running away with a ship, see U. S. v. Haskell, 4 Wash. C. C. 402. Robbery on the high seas directed against all mankind is piracy jure gentium. U. S. v. Smith, 5 Wheat. (U. S.), 153, 161; but under the statutes relating to this offence, persons (Southern States rebels) were held guilty of piracy who planned and carried out attacks on American vessels only. See the case of the Savannah Pirates. U. S. v. Baker, 5 Blatchf. (U. S.), 6. U. S. Statt. Rev. s. 5372; and U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 610; Klintock's case, 5 Wheat. (U. S.), 144, 184; the 'Malek Adhel,' 2 How. (U. S.), 219; the 'Ambrose Light' [1885], 25 Fed. Rep. 408.

the goods with a felonious intention in any place where the Lord Admiral hath jurisdiction, this is robbery and piracy' (d). It is equally piracy jure gentium if the passengers do such acts as would make the mariners pirates (e).

An act is not cognisable as piracy jure gentium if done as an act of war (animo belligerendi), and under the authority of a prince or state: but depredating on the high seas without such authority is piracy, even if the motive is not plunder, if the act was done wilfully and without legal authority or lawful excuse. The American view developed during the Civil War appears to deprive a community in rebellion of the right to commit belligerent acts upon the sea against the state from which it has rebelled, unless the rebellious state has received recognition of belligerent rights from some sovereign power (f). The accepted distinction between belligerency and piracy is the recognition of the existence of a regularly organised de facto government. Such recognition is regarded as an executive, and not as a judicial question (g).

In Republic of Bolivia v. Mutual Indemnity Marine Insurance Co. (h), Pickford, J., accepted as the popular or business meaning of piracy the definition of the late Mr. Hall (i): 'Though the absence of competent authority is the test of piracy, its essence consists in the pursuit of private, as contrasted with public, ends. Primarily the pirate is a man who satisfies his personal greed or his personal vengeance by robbery or murder in places beyond the jurisdiction of a State. The man who acts with a public object may do like acts to a certain extent, but his moral attitude is different, and the acts themselves will be kept within well-marked bounds. He is not only not the enemy of the human race, but he is the enemy solely of a particular State.' The learned judge continued: 'Several, but not all, of the definitions cited in the note on p. 260 of the same work bear out that idea. There is another passage in Hall, at p. 262, which throws some light upon the matter. Speaking of depredations committed at sea upon the public or private vessels of a state, or descents upon its territory from the sea by persons not acting under the authority of any politically organised community, notwithstanding that the objects of such persons may be professedly political, Hall said that such acts were piratical within the meaning of the term in international law, but he went on to say this:—"Sometimes they are mitted on land would have amounted to felony. 1 Hawk. c. 37, s. 4. 2 East, P. C. 776. Mason's Case, 4 Bl. Com. 72. Others regard it as the same offence as robbery on land. Archb. Vict. Acts, 72. 2 Hale, 369. 1 Hale, 354. Coke, 3 Inst. 113, calls a pirate a 'robber on the sea.' Piracy is a maritime offence, and cannot be committed on a river, however large, far within the boundaries of a State. Republic of Bolivia v. Oriental Indemnity Insurance Co., infra.

In that case a brigantine commissioned by rebels as a Colombian vessel of war was seized by a United States warship and brought in for condemnation as prize under the law of nations as piratical. There was not at the time any recognition of belligerency or of an existing state of war in Colombia. Held that the seizure was technically authorised by the law of nations.

wholly political in their objects and are directed solely against a particular state, with careful avoidance of depredation or attack upon the persons or property of the subjects of other states. In such cases, though the acts done are piratical with reference to the state attacked, they are for practical purposes not piratical with reference to other states, because they neither interfere with nor menace the safety of those states, nor the general good order of the seas. It will be seen presently that the difference between piracy of this kind and piracy in its coarser forms has a bearing upon usage with respect to the exercise of jurisdiction.”’

The question involved in the case was whether the seizure of a steamer under the Brazilian flag carrying provisions to a Bolivian garrison on a tributary of the Amazon, was piracy within the meaning of an insurance policy. The seizure was made by rebels in an outlying Bolivian district, who claimed to have organised themselves into the Free Republic of Acre, a government not recognised by any foreign power (j).

To constitute piracy jure gentium, it is not necessary that there should be any throwing off of the allegiance of the state to which the vessel belongs: but it is sufficient if there is a taking of the ship within the jurisdiction of the admiral from the possession or control of those who are lawfully entitled to it, and a carrying away of the ship or of any of its goods, tackle, apparel, or furniture, under circumstances which would have amounted to robbery if the acts had been done on land (k). It is immaterial whether the piratical acts are done by mariners or passengers (l), or persons coming from the shore (m).

In time of peace, any act of depredation on a ship is prima facie an act of piracy, but in time of war between two countries, the presumption is that depredation by the citizens of one country upon a ship of the other is an act of legitimate warfare, and it is immaterial whether the act was done by soldiers or volunteers, and whether it was commanded by the State of which they were citizens, or when done ratified by it. The animus belligerendi excludes the animus furandi which is an essential element in robbery (n).

Piracy jure gentium is justiciable in the Courts of every country (o). In England until 1536, it was rarely, if ever, tried according to the course of the common law by judge and jury, but was dealt with by the admiral or under his jurisdiction, according to the course of the civil law (p). The Offences at Sea Act, 1536 (28 Hen. VIII. c. 15), after reciting ‘where traitors, pirates, thieves, robbers, murtherers, and confederatours upon the sea many times escape unpunished because the trial of their offences hath heretofore been ordered judged and determined before the admiral or his lieutenant or commissary, after the course of the civil laws, . . . enacts that 'all treasons, felonies, robberies, murders, and confederacies, hereafter to be committed in or upon the sea, or in any other haven, river, creek, or place where the admiral or admirals have, or pretend to have, power, authority, or jurisdiction (q), shall be enquired, heard, determined, and judged, in such shires and places in the realm as shall be limited by the King's commission or commissions, to be directed for the same in like form and condition as if any such offence or offences had been done in or upon the land: and such commissions shall be had under the King's Great Seal directed to the admiral or admirals and his or their lieutenant deputy or deputies, and to three or four such other substantial persons as shall be named or appointed by the Lord Chancellor of England, for the time being, from time to time, and as often as need shall require, to hear and determine such offences after the common course of the laws of this land, used for treasons felonies robberies murders and confederacies of the same done and committed upon the land within this realm' (r).

This statute, though it provides for the trial of piracy according to the course of the common law, and for capital punishment, does not change the nature of the offence (s), nor in terms make it felony (t). It does not extend to offences made piracy by statute, unless the Act so provides (u).

In 1693, the Lords of the Council resolved to try Golding and others (v) for piracy, in respect of the depredations by privateers acting under commissions from James II. The King's advocate (Oldish) gave his opinion that they were not pirates, and was called before the Council to support that opinion, which he based on the views—(a) That James II., though he had lost his crown, had not lost his right; (b) that in the face of commissions de facto granted by James II. there could be no piracy. Oldish was removed from office, and the alleged pirates were tried and convicted by his successor, and some, if not all, were executed (w).

In 1696, several mariners on board a ship lying near Coruña seized the captain, he not agreeing with them; and having put him on shore, carried away the ship, and afterwards committed several piracies. This force upon the captain, and the carrying away the ship, which was explained by the use of it afterwards, was adjudged piracy (x). But in 1722, where the master of a vessel loaded goods on board at Rotterdam consigned to Malaga, which he caused to be insured, and after he had run the goods on shore in England the ship was burned, when he protested both the ship and cargo as burned, with intent to defraud the owner and insurers; the judges of the common law, who assisted the judges of the Admiralty, directed an acquittal upon an indictment for piracy and stealing the goods; because being only a breach of trust and no felony, it could not be piracy to convert the goods in a fraudulent manner until the special trust was determined (y).

For a trial under Scots Law for piracy, see Green's case [1705], 14 St. Tr. 1199. This case was one of the contributory causes to the making of the Treaty of Union with Scotland.

SECT. II.—PIRACY BY MUNICIPAL LAW.

Duty to resist Pirates.—By an Act of 1670 (22 & 23 Car. II. c. 11) penalties are imposed on the master of a ship, who, without fighting, yields up to Turkish vessels, or pirates, or sea rovers, goods or merchandise laden on board English ships of 200 tons or upwards, and mounted with sixteen or more guns (sect. 1), or English ships of less tonnage or guns (sect. 3). There is a provision in favour of the master if forced to yield up his ship by the disobedience of the crew, testified by their laying violent hands on him (sect. 7). Mariners or inferior officers in such laden vessels who decline or refuse to fight or defend their ships are to forfeit their wages and goods in the ship, and to suffer imprisonment for not more than six months with hard labour (sect. 6). The Act also contains provisions for compensating officers or seamen wounded in defence of such ship (sect. 9), and for prize-money if the attacking vessel is taken (sect. 10) (z).

An Act of 1698 (11 Will. III. c. 7) enacts (sect. 7) (a) that ‘if any of His Majesty’s natural-born subjects, or denizens of this kingdom shall commit any piracy or robbery or any act of hostility against other His Majesty’s subjects upon the sea under colour of any commission from any foreign prince or state, or pretence of authority from any person whatsoever such offender and offenders shall be deemed adjudged and taken to be pirates, felons, and robbers; and they and every one of them being duly convicted thereof, according to that Act, or the Offences at Sea Act, 1536, shall suffer such pains . . . as pirates, &c., upon the seas ought to suffer’ (b). This Act seems to have been consequent on the case of R. v. Vaughan (c).

By sect. 8 (d), ‘If any commander or master of any ship, or any seaman or mariner, shall, in any place where the admiral hath jurisdiction, betray his trust, and turn pirate, enemy, or rebel, and piratically and feloniously run away with his or their ship or ships, or any barge, boat, ordnance, ammunition, goods, or merchandises; or yield them up voluntarily to any pirate; or shall bring any seducing messages from any pirate, enemy, or rebel; or consult, combine, or confederate with, or attempt or endeavour to corrupt any commander, master, officer, or mariner, to yield up or run away with any ship, goods, or merchandises, or turn pirate, or go over to pirates; or if any person shall lay violent hands on his commander, whereby to hinder him from fighting in defence of his ship, and goods committed to his trust (e), or that (sic) shall confine his master, or make or endeavour to make a revolt in the ship, shall be adjudged, deemed, and taken to be a pirate, felon, and robber, and being convicted thereof according to the direction of this Act, shall suffer . . . as pirates, felons, and robbers upon the seas ought to suffer' (f).

In an indictment for confining a captain of a ship, 'constructive' confinement will satisfy the requirements of the statute, and this will be supported by evidence that, although no force was used, the captain was restrained by the presence and gestures of the prisoners, and deprived of his lawful command, and compelled to remain in certain parts of the vessel (g).

Making or endeavouring to make a revolt, with a view to procure a redress of what the prisoners thought grievances, and without any intent to run away with the ship, or to commit any act of piracy, was held to be an offence within sect. 8 (h).

Where one count charged the prisoners with making, and another with endeavouring to make a revolt in a ship, it appeared that great complaints had been made by the sailors in the course of the voyage about the provisions and the great heat of the cabin where the men had to sleep, which on account of the fire for cooking, &c., being close to it, was unsupportable in the warm latitudes. The prisoner M. refused to go on duty. The captain in consequence ordered the crew to put M. in irons, but instead of obeying him they walked away forward. The prisoner S. had the same morning refused to go to his duty, and he and one G. went towards the captain, who was endeavouring, with the assistance of his officers, to put M. in irons. Violent language was used by both, and threats uttered against the captain, and G. rushed to a boat where whale spears were kept, with the evident intention of seizing one of them, and releasing M. by force. The captain shot G. in the act of laying hold of a spear. Abinger, C.B., said: 'By revolt I understand something like rebellion or resistance to lawful authority, and if the crew of a ship combine together to resist the captain, especially if the object be to deprive him of his authority altogether, it will in my opinion amount to making a revolt. I think upon the construction of this Act of Parliament that the resistance of one person to the authority of the captain would not be a revolt. Revolt means something more than the disobedience of one man. I think it would be straining the evidence rather too far to say that the conduct of these men amounted to a revolt; and the charge of making a revolt, if my construction of the Act be correct, will fall to the ground. The question of whether the ship was properly fitted up and found is not material; for it has been decided that, although there be real grievances to redress, yet it is not an answer to a charge of attempting to make a revolt. If G. and the prisoners were united in some common design to prevent the captain from putting M. in irons, which on the evidence he had a sufficient justification in doing, and calling upon others of the crew to assist them in resisting the captain's authority, then I think that it was an attempt to excite a revolt' (i).

On an indictment upon 11 Will. III. c. 7, s. 8, it appeared that the prisoners were two of the mates and the others mariners of a merchant ship. The captain ordered a sailor to go and grease the masts, which the captain thought necessary to be done. The sailor peremptorily refused, and the captain on that ordered all hands up: he desired the mates to have the masts greased, which the men refused to do, and said that it was the duty of the boys, and that whilst there were boys on board they would not. The captain positively insisted, and the men as positively refused. He then ordered the beef for the men's dinners to be taken below, on which there was a peremptory refusal to let him have it. The captain went down and armed himself with a cutlass, came again on deck, and speaking to the steward said, 'Take that beef below, and the first man who interferes, I will cut him down.' The steward obeyed; the beef was taken down and the captain put away his cutlass, and, after staying on deck some time, went down, and believing he had done sufficient to assert his authority, he sent the beef back, and allowed the crew to have their dinners. After this the steward requested the captain to come on deck, as the men wanted to speak to him. He went on deck, was made prisoner, and confined in his cabin, the vessel put about, and brought to Plymouth by the mate and crew, and there the crew made a complaint against the captain. Williams, J., told the jury that in considering the meaning of the terms used in the statute he must tell them that confederating together and making a revolt constituted the offence charged, unless they were satisfied that there was some justifiable cause. The great question for their consideration was, whether or not there was any justification for this unquestionable confinement of the captain. Did, therefore, his conduct afford any justification for that step? He was bound to tell them that, according to the authorities, a seaman was not justified in making a revolt in a ship, or in imprisoning his captain, by reason of that captain having been unjust or unreasonable; it was not to be allowed that seamen should take the law into their own hands, because the captain had issued an unjust order, or had conducted himself in a harassing or embarrassing manner. If the rule of law was that whenever the seamen considered the captain's conduct unreasonable and rash, they could take charge of the ship, there would be an end to all maritime discipline. It was necessary, for the due maintenance of discipline, that mutiny and revolt, if not justifiable, should be punished as a crime in the merchant service as well as in the royal navy. In his opinion, in point of law, it was justifiable in one view only, namely, if the conduct of the captain had been such as to afford reasonable ground for concluding that, unless the men had imprisoned him, the crew, or some one or more of them, would have been in danger of their lives, or of suffering some grievous bodily harm from his conduct. If they thought that was made out, and that the conduct of the captain was such that the lives of the crew were in danger unless he were imprisoned, then there was a justification. But if they should not come to the conclusion that there was reasonable ground for this belief, then, in point of law, they ought to find the prisoners guilty (j).

On an indictment under the same section, for making a revolt in a British merchant ship, it appeared that the prisoners formed part of the crew of a steamer trading between London and Holland; their register tickets were deposited with the captain, but no agreement in writing had been entered into with them previously to their sailing on the voyage during which the revolt was made, and the recorder held that the prisoners were not mariners, or seamen; because 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 2 (k), made any contract other than the agreement thereby required illegal, and therefore the relation of commander and mariner did not exist (l). Offences of the kind dealt with in the two cases last cited can now be treated as offences against discipline, under sect. 225 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60).

The Piracy Act, 1717 (4 Geo. I. c. 11), declares (sect. 7) 'that all persons who have committed or shall commit offences within the Act of 1698, may be tried and judged under the Offences at Sea Act, 1536,' and deprived them of the benefit of clergy (m).

The Piracy Act, 1721 (8 Geo. I. c. 24), enacts (sect. 1) that 'if any commander or master of any ship or vessel, or any other person or persons, shall . . . anywise trade with any pirate by truck, barter, exchange, or in any other manner, or shall furnish any pirate, felon, or robber upon the seas, with any ammunition, provision, or stores of any kind; or shall fit out any ship or vessel knowingly, and with a design to trade with, or supply, or correspond with any pirate, felon, or robber upon the seas; or if any person or persons shall any ways consult, combine, confederate, or correspond with any pirate, felon, or robber, on the seas, knowing him to be guilty of any such piracy, felony, or robbery, every such offender and offenders shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of piracy, felony, and robbery (n) . . . and he and they shall and may be inquired of, tried, heard, and adjudged of, and for all or any the matters aforesaid,' according to the Offences at Sea Act, 1536, and the Act of 1698, 'and he and they being convicted of all or any the matters aforesaid, shall suffer such pains . . . as pirates, felons, and robbers upon the sea ought to suffer.' The same section further enacts that 'in case any person or persons belonging to any ship or vessel whatsoever, upon meeting any merchant ship or vessel on the high seas, or in any port, haven, or creek

(j) R. v. Rose, 2 Cox, 329. As reported, this direction is open to the objection that it did not inform the jury that the captain might lawfully use any force that was reasonably necessary to retain the command of the vessel and stop the revolt, and that the crew would not be justified in imprisoning him for using such force for that purpose; but, no doubt, the learned judge did so direct the jury.

British merchant ships are now regulated by ss. 113–125 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), and by the Colonial Navigation Acts of Australia, New Zealand, Canada, &c.

whatsoever, shall forcibly board or enter into such ship or vessel, and though they do not seize or carry off such ship or vessel, shall throw over-board or destroy any part of the goods or merchandises belonging to such ship or vessel; the person or persons guilty thereof, shall in all respects be deemed and punished as pirates aforesaid' (nn).

The Act of 1721 extends to all the King's dominions in Asia, Africa, and America (sect. 10) (o).

The Piracy Act, 1744 (18 Geo. II. c. 30), recites that doubts had arisen whether subjects entering into the service of the King's enemies on board privateers and other ships, having commissions from France and Spain, and having by such adherence been guilty of high treason, could be deemed guilty of felony within the intent of the Act of 1698, and be triable by the Court of Admiralty by virtue of the said Act; and then enacts (sect. 1) that 'all persons, being natural-born subjects or denizens of His Majesty, who during the present or any future wars, shall commit any hostilities upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, against His Majesty's subjects, by virtue or under colour of any commission from any of His Majesty's enemies, or have been or shall be any other ways adherent or giving aid or comfort to His Majesty's enemies upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, may be tried as pirates, felons, and robbers in the said Court of Admiralty, on ship-board, or upon the land, in the same manner as persons guilty of piracy, felony, and robbery, are by the said Act (of 1698) (p) directed to be tried; and such persons being upon such trial convicted thereof, shall suffer such pains' (q) . . . 'as any other pirates, felons, and robbers ought, by virtue of the said recited Act (of 1698), or any other Act, to suffer' (r).

This enactment does not in terms say that the offenders shall be deemed pirates, &c., as in the Act of 1698 (ante, p. 259).

On an indictment framed upon this enactment the question was raised whether adhering to the King's enemies in hostilely cruising in their ships could be tried as piracy under the usual commission granted under the Act of 1536 (ante, p. 257). The question was reserved for consideration of the judges; and it was agreed by eight judges who were present (s), that the prisoner had been well tried under the commission:

for that taking the Acts of 1698 and 1744 together, and the doubt raised in the latter, and also its enactment that in the instances therein mentioned, and also in case of any other adhering to the King's enemies, the parties might be tried as pirates by the Court of Admiralty according to that statute, it was substantially declaring that they should be deemed pirates; and that it was a just construction in their favour to allow them to be tried as such by a jury (t).

By the Piracy Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 26), s. 2, 'Whenever any of His Majesty's ships or vessels of war, or hired armed vessels or their boats, or any of the officers or crews thereof shall attach or be engaged with any persons alleged to be pirates, afloat or ashore, it shall be lawful for the High Court of Admiralty in England, and for all Courts of Admiralty in any dominions of His Majesty beyond the seas . . . to take cognisance and to determine whether the person, or any of them so attached or engaged were pirates, and to adjudge what was the total number of pirates so engaged or attached, specifying the number of pirates captured and what were the vessels or boats engaged' (u).

SECT. III.—ACCESSORIES AND PUNISHMENT.

Accessories to Piracy.

Accessories.—Until 1700, accessories to piracy were triable only by the civil law if their offence was committed on the sea, and one who within the body of a county, knowing, received and abetted a pirate was not triable by the common law, the original offence being solely cognisable by another jurisdiction (v). This rule flowed from the theory that piracy not being a common-law felony, the common-law rule as to accessories did not apply, and from the common-law rules as to jurisdiction (w). This anomaly has been removed by legislation.

By sect. 9 (x) of the Act of 1698 (11 Will. III. c. 7), every person and persons whatsoever, who shall (after September 29, 1700) either on the land or upon the seas, knowingly or wittingly set forth any pirate; or aid and assist, or maintain, procure, command, counsel, or advise, any person or persons whatsoever, to do or commit any piracies or robberies upon the seas; and such person and persons shall thereupon do or commit any such piracy or robbery, then all and every such person or persons whatsoever, so as escape out of prison; and, on a return to a habeas corpus, the prisoner was remanded, though it appeared that the fact was committed by him within the body of a county. The Court of King's Bench holding, that because Scadding's offence depended on the piracy committed by the principal, of which the temporal judges had no cognisance, and was, as it were, an accessorial offence to the first piracy which was determinable by the admiral, it was sufficient ground for remanding him. aforesaid setting forth any pirate, or aiding, assisting, maintaining, procuring, commanding, counselling, or advising, the same either on the land or upon the sea, shall be and are hereby declared, and shall be deemed and adjudged to be accessory to such piracy and robbery, done and committed. Sect. 10 (y) enacts, 'and further, that after any piracy or robbery is or shall be committed by any pirate or robber whatsoever, every person and persons, who, knowing that such pirate or robber has done or committed such piracy and robbery, shall, on the land or upon the sea, receive, entertain, or conceal any such pirate or robber, or receive or take into his custody any ship, vessel, goods, or chattels, which have been by any such pirate or robber piratically and feloniously taken; shall be, and are hereby likewise declared, deemed, and adjudged to be accessory to such piracy and robbery (z): and . . . that all such accessories to such piracies and robberies shall be inquired of, tried, heard, determined, and adjudged, after the common course of the laws of this land, according to the Offences at Sea Act, 1536, as the principals of such piracies and robberies may and ought to be, and no otherwise: and being thereupon attainted, shall suffer such pains . . . and in like manner, as such principals ought to suffer, according to the Offences at Sea Act, 1536, which is thereby declared to be and shall continue in full force . . . ' (a).

The Piracy Act, 1721 (8 Geo. I. c. 24), after reciting that 'whereas there are some defects in the laws for bringing persons who are accessories to piracy and robbery upon the seas to condign punishment, if the principal who committed such piracy or robbery is not or cannot be apprehended and brought to justice,' enacts (sect. 3) that 'all persons whatsoever, who by the Act of 1698 are declared to be accessory or accessories to any piracy or robbery therein mentioned, are hereby declared to be principal pirates, felons, and robbers, and shall and may be inquired of, heard, determined, and adjudged, in the same manner as persons guilty of piracy and robbery may and ought to be inquired of, tried, heard, determined, and adjudged according to that statute; and being thereupon attainted and convicted, shall suffer such pains . . . and in like (b) manner as pirates and robbers ought by the said Act to suffer.'

Punishment.

The Offences at Sea Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. c. 37), after reciting the Act of 1536, enacts (sect. 1) that 'all and every offence and offences committed (after May 10, 1799) upon the high seas out of the body of any county of this realm, shall be and they are hereby declared to be offences of the same nature respectively, and to be liable to the same punishments as if they had been committed upon the shore, and shall be inquired of,' &c., 'in the same manner as treasons,' &c., 'under the Offences at Sea Act, 1536' (bb).

Under the Acts of 1536 (c), 1698 (d), 1717 (e), 1721 (f), and 1744 (g), piracy was punishable by death, and forfeiture of lands, goods, and chattels. Offenders within the Acts of 1536 and 1721 were deprived of benefit of clergy (h). In 1820 benefit of clergy was allowed to persons tried under the Act of 1536 for offences at sea in all cases in which benefit of clergy would have been allowed as to the offences if committed on land (i). By the Piracy Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 88), s. 1 (j), the provisions of the above stated Acts as to the punishment of the crime of piracy or of any offence in any of the said Acts declared to be piracy, or of accessories thereto respectively, were repealed, and the punishment of such offences (if tried in England) is now regulated by the following sections of the Act of 1837, as modified by the Penal Servitude Acts of 1857 and 1891 (k).

Sect. 2 enacts, 'Whosoever, with intent to commit or at the time of or immediately before or immediately after committing the crime of piracy in respect of any ship or vessel, shall assault, with intent to murder, any person being on board of or belonging to such ship or vessel, or shall stab, cut, or wound any such person, or unlawfully do any act by which the life of such person may be endangered, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall suffer death as a felon' (l).

By sect. 3, 'Whosoever shall be convicted of any offence which by any of the Acts hereinbefore referred to (m) amounts to the crime of piracy, and is thereby made punishable by death, shall be liable . . . to be transported (n) beyond the seas for the term of the natural life of such offender. . . . (o)'

By Sect. 4, 'In the case of every felony punishable under this Act every principal in the second degree and every accessory before the fact shall be punishable with death or otherwise in the same manner as the principal in the first degree is by this Act punishable; and every accessory after the fact to any felony punishable under this Act shall, on conviction, be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years' (p).

(p) This statute having repealed the punishment of piracy 'at common law,' which was before punishable by 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15, s. 3, with death without benefit of clergy, a difficulty arises as to what is now the punishment for that offence. The Offences at Sea Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. c. 37), s. 1, ante, p. 265, by making all offences committed on sea of the same nature as if they were committed on shore, seems to have made piracy jure gentium a felony, which it was not at common law, or by 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15. By 60 Geo. III. & 1 Geo. IV. c. 90, any person found guilty of any capital crime or offence committed upon the sea, which, if committed upon the land would be clergyable, was entitled to the benefit of clergy in like manner as if he

By sect. 16 of the Capital Punishment (Ireland) Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 28), persons convicted of any offence which amounts to the crime of piracy by any Act in force in Ireland are liable to penal servitude for life.

SECT. IV.—JURISDICTION AND PROCEDURE.

Piracy has been put into the same position as treason and felony with respect to pleas of not guilty, refusal to plead (q), and peremptory challenge of jurors in excess of the number which the law allows (r).

Of the Courts by which the Offence of Piracy may be tried :

(a) Trial in England.

The offence of piracy was formerly cognisable only by the Admiralty Courts, which proceeded without a jury, after the course of the civil law and with the rules of that law as to torture and proof. The inconveniences found to attend this procedure led to the passing of the Offences at Sea Act, 1536 (28 Hen. VIII. c. 15) (ante, p. 257). That statute enacted, that this offence and certain other offences committed within the jurisdiction of the admiral should be tried under the King's Commission, by commissioners nominated by the Lord Chancellor, the indictment being first found by a grand jury of twelve men, and afterwards tried by another jury as at common law, and that the course of proceeding should be according to the law of the land. Amongst the commissioners there were always some of the common-law judges (s). But the Act merely altered the mode of trial in the Admiralty Court; and its jurisdiction continued to rest on the same foundations as it did before that Act. It is regulated by the civil law, et per consuetudines marinas grounded on the law of nations, which may possibly give to that Court a jurisdiction that our common law has not (t).

By the Offences at Sea Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 2), s. 1, justices of Assize, Oyer and Terminer, and Gaol Delivery are given all the powers, which by any Act are given to the commissioners named in any commission of Oyer and Terminer, for the trying of offences committed on the high seas or in other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England (u). This Act has rendered it unnecessary to hold criminal

IV. c. 28, s. 6, clergy was abolished, and by s. 7 no person convicted of felony was to suffer death unless for some felony excluded from clergy, on or before the first day of that session of Parliament; and by s. 12, 'all offences prosecuted in the High Court of Admiralty shall, upon every first and subsequent conviction, be subject to the same punishments, whether of death or otherwise, as if such offences had been committed upon land.' See also the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861. By 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 36, piracy may be tried at the Central Criminal Court. 'On the whole, it seems that each act of piracy jure sessions of the Court of Admiralty, but does not affect the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court (v), nor the power of the Crown to issue special commissions under the Act of 1536.

It is expressly provided by sect. 6 of the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 73), which applies to the whole of the King's dominions (see preamble), that that Act shall not prejudice nor affect the trial in manner heretofore (August 16, 1878) in use of any act of piracy as defined by the law of nations, or affect or prejudice any law relating thereto: and where any act of piracy as defined by the law of nations is also any such offence as is declared by this Act to be within the jurisdiction of the admiral, such offence may be tried in pursuance of this Act or in pursuance of any other Act of Parliament, law, or custom relating thereto.

(b) Trial in British Possessions Abroad.

As a general rule it is not within the province of a colonial legislature to deal directly with the offence of piracy jure gentium, or directly to assume jurisdiction over piratical acts done outside the territorial waters of the colony. During the nineteenth century trials for piracy in England and Ireland were very rare, but they were somewhat more frequent in British possessions adjacent to regions where the slave trade was carried on, or to Asiatic communities of piratical propensities. The extent to which the English Acts already referred to apply to British possessions varies according to the history and legislation of the particular possession, i.e., with the extent to which the English law against piracy is the common law of the possession, or has been incorporated by its legislation. It would seem that the legislature of a British possession has no authority to alter the definition of piracy jure gentium (w).

By the Act of 1698 (11 Will. III. c. 7), after reciting the difficulties found in bringing to justice pirates in the East and West Indies, and the growth of piracy in these parts it is enacted (sect. 1), that all piracies, felonies, and robberies, committed on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of the admiral, might be tried and punished in any place at sea or upon the land in any of the King's islands, plantations, colonies, forts, or factories, to be appointed by the King's commission in the manner therein directed and according to the civil law and the methods and rules of the Admiralty (x).

By the Offences at Sea Act, 1806 (46 Geo. III. c. 54), it is provided that piracy, &c., within the jurisdiction of the admiral should be tried according to the common law of this realm used for offences committed upon the land within the realm, and not otherwise, in any British possession by the King's commission under the Great Seal of Great Britain.

By the Australian Courts Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 83), the Supreme Courts of New South Wales and Tasmania are given jurisdiction (inter alia) over piracies (s. 4), which are to be dealt with as if the offence had been committed and tried in England.

(v) 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 36, s. 22.

(w) See note of Sir S. Griffith to draft Queensland Criminal Code, p. x.

(x) Ss. 1-6 were repealed in 1867 (S. L. R.). For a trial under them, see R. v.

Quelch [1704], 14 St. Tr. 1067, at Boston, Mass. And see R. v. Bonnet [1718], 15 St. Tr. 1231, for a trial at Vice-Admiralty Sessions at Charlestown, North Carolina.

By the Admiralty Offences Colonial Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 96), 'If any person within any colony (y) shall be charged with the commission of any . . . piracy, felony, robbery . . . or other offence, of what nature or kind soever committed upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place where the admiral or admirals have power, authority, or jurisdiction, or if any person charged with the commission of any such offence upon the sea, or in, &c., shall be brought for trial to any colony, then, and in every case all magistrates, justices of the peace, public prosecutors, juries, judges, courts, public officers, and other persons in such colony shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction and authorities for inquiring of, trying, hearing, determining, and adjudging such offences, and they are hereby respectively authorised, empowered, and required to institute and carry on all such proceedings for bringing the person so charged for trial as aforesaid, and for and auxiliary to and consequent upon the trial of any such person for any such offence wherewith he may be charged as aforesaid as by the law of such colony would and ought to have been had and exercised or instituted and carried on by them respectively if such offence had been committed and such person had been charged with having committed the same upon any waters situate within the limits of any such colony and within the limits of the local jurisdiction of the courts of criminal justice of that colony' (z).

The definition of colony in sect. 5 of this Act includes all British possessions except British India and the British Islands : but was extended in 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 88, s. 1) so as to include British India, subject to a right in favour of the accused in certain cases to be tried by the High Courts of Bengal, Bombay, or Madras (sect. 2).

By sect. 2 of the Act of 1849 provision was made for the trial in the colonies of offences involving homicide, where the death was on land from an injury inflicted at sea, or at sea from an injury inflicted on land. And by the Admiralty Offences Colonial Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 122), Colonial legislatures were empowered to include in their own legislation provisions similar to those last above stated, which were derived from 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 8, and are now as to England and Ireland included in sect. 68 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100).

The Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 27), does not give any jurisdiction to Colonial Admiralty Courts to try any person for an offence which, by the law of England, is punishable on indictment, and in substance deals only with civil jurisdiction of these Courts (sect. 2, subs. 3 (c)).

In a case tried at Penang in 1840 (a), the accused was tried with others on the Admiralty side of the Court with piracy, i.e. forcible capture on the high seas of a boat, the captain and crew whereof were put in bodily fear and in danger of their lives. The pleas raised were (1) that the accused was not a British subject nor a person amenable to the law of England respecting piracy, (2) that the acts alleged to be piratical, were acts of war (b).

(y) i.e. all 'British possessions' outside the 'British Islands' (see s. 5 and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 88).

Mr. Justice Ritchie held further that if the proceedings for the offence are taken under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (Imp.), sec. 686, the consent of the Governor-General is not required, and Code sec. 591 would not apply. But a different view was taken by Mr. Justice Weatherbe who held that sec. 591 applies to the procedure in Canadian Courts in respect of offences committed within the Admiralty Jurisdiction whether the proceedings are taken under the Criminal Code or the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act or the Admiralty Offence Act, 1849. *R. v. CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF DEALING IN SLAVES, ETC.

SECT. I.—THE SLAVE TRADE ACTS.

A LIST of enactments still in force relating to the slave trade is given in note (a) below. Most of these Acts apply to the whole of the King's dominions.

The Slave Trade Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 113), also described as the Slave Trade Consolidation Act (b), repealed all the prior Acts and enactments relating to the slave trade, except so far as they had repealed prior Acts or enactments, or had been acted upon, or were expressly confirmed by the Act. It enacts (sect. 2), that it shall not be lawful, except in such special cases as are thereafter mentioned (c), to deal in slaves, or to remove, import, ship, trans-ship, &c., any persons as slaves, or to fit out, employ, &c., any vessels in order to accomplish such unlawful objects, or to lend money, &c., or to become guarantee, &c., for agents in relation to such objects, or in any other manner to engage directly or indirectly, therein, as a partner, agent, or otherwise; or to ship, &c., any money, goods, or effects, to be employed in accomplishing any of these unlawful objects; or to command, or embark on board, or contract for commanding or embarking on board, any vessel, &c., in any capacity, knowing that such vessel, &c., is employed, or intended to be employed, in such unlawful objects; or to insure or contract for insuring, any slaves or other property, employed, or intended to be employed, in accomplishing any of these unlawful objects. Pecuniary penalties and forfeitures are (by sects. 3-8) imposed upon persons offending, by engaging in such unlawful objects (d).

By sect. 9, 'If any subject or subjects of His Majesty, or any person

(b) Repealed by the Slave Trade Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 88), s. 30, except ss. 2-11, s. 12 down to 'taken to be in full force,' ss. 39, 40, and 47.

(c) Certain cases were excepted from the Act of 1824. These exceptions were repealed in 1833 by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 73, which, after manumitting, as from Aug. 1, 1834, all slaves in the British Colonies, plantations and possessions abroad, enacts, 'The children thereafter to be born to any such person and the offspring of such children shall in like manner be free from their birth; and slavery shall be and is hereby utterly and for ever abolished and declared unlawful throughout the British colonies, plantations and possessions abroad' (s. 12). The rest of this Act was repealed in 1890 (S. L. R.). As to the effect of the repeal of the exceptions from the Act of 1824, see R. v. Jennings, post, p. 273.

(d) These sections do not directly create any criminal offence.

or persons residing or being within any of the dominions, forts, settlements, factories, or territories now or hereafter belonging to His Majesty, or being in His Majesty's occupation or possession, or under the government of the united company of merchants of England trading to the East Indies (e), shall' (after January 1, 1825), 'upon the high seas, or in any haven, river, creek, or place where the admiral has jurisdiction, knowingly and wilfully carry away, convey, or remove or aid, or assist in carrying away, conveying, or removing, any person or persons as a slave or slaves, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being imported or brought as a slave or slaves, into any island, colony, country, territory, or place whatsoever, or for the purpose of his, her, or their being sold, transferred, used, or dealt with as a slave or slaves; or shall (after January 1, 1825 . . . Habitual dealing in slaves is punishable under s. 371 of the Indian Penal Code; isolated dealings under s. 370; and kidnapping in order to subject to slavery under s. 367. See Mayne Ind. Cr. L. Offences under these sections, if committed by a subject of the King, or of an allied force on the high seas, or in Asia or Africa, are punishable in India under the Slave Trade Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 46), s. 1.

The present punishment by the effect of the Penal Servitude Acts, 1857 and 1891, ante, pp. 211, 212, is penal servitude for life or not less than three years, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not less than two years. Forfeiture of lands, goods and chattels was abolished in 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23), and the portions of 7 Will. Seamen serving on Slavers.—Sect. 11. . . . 'If any person shall enter and embark on board, or contract for the entering and embarking on board of any ship, vessel, or boat, as petty officer, seaman, marine, or servant, or in any other capacity not hereinbefore specifically mentioned, knowing that such ship, vessel, or boat is actually employed, or is, in the same voyage, or upon the same occasion, in respect of which they shall so enter and embark on board, or contract so to do as aforesaid, intended to be employed in accomplishing any of the objects, or the contracts in relation to the objects, which objects and contracts have hereinbefore been declared unlawful, then and in every such case the persons so offending, and their procurers, counsellors, aiders, and abettors, shall be and they are hereby declared to be, guilty of a misdemeanor only, and shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.'

Criminal Clauses not to affect Civil and Penal Clauses.—Sect. 12. 'Provided always, that nothing in this Act contained, making piracies, felonies, robberies, and misdemeanors of the several offences aforesaid, shall be construed to repeal, annul, or alter the provisions and enactments in this Act also contained, (viz., sects. 5-8, ante, p. 271) imposing forfeitures and penalties, or either of them upon the same offences, or to repeal, annul, or alter the remedies given for the recovery thereof; but that the said provisions and enactments, imposing forfeitures and penalties, shall in all respects be deemed and taken to be in full force' (n).

Informers exempted from Penalties.—Sect. 40. 'Provided always if any person offending as a petty officer, seaman, marine, or servant, against any of the provisions of this Act, shall, within two years after the offence committed, give information on oath before any competent magistrate against any owner or part-owner, or any captain, master, mate, surgeon, or supercargo of any ship or vessel, who shall have committed any offence against this Act, and shall give evidence on oath against such owner, etc., before any magistrate or Court before whom such

(m) The provisions as to imprisonment are not specifically repealed. By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 26, s. 1 (rep. 1895), where Courts were empowered or required to impose a sentence of transportation for over seven years, they were authorised to substitute a term of not less than seven years, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years. 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, authorises a minimum term of penal servitude of three years, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not over two years. It is submitted that the Act of 1891 does (if the Act of 1846 had not already done it) supersede the power of imprisonment given in s. 9.

(n) The rest of the section is omitted as repealed in 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 88, s. 30). Ss. 13-38 were repealed in 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 88, s. 30). offender may be tried; or if such person or persons so offending shall give information to any of His Majesty's ambassadors, ministers, etc., or other agents, so that any person or persons owning such ship or vessel, or navigating or taking charge of the same, as captain, master, mate, surgeon, or supercargo, may be apprehended; such person or persons so giving information and evidence shall not be liable to any of the pains or penalties under this Act incurred in respect of his offence, and His Majesty's ambassadors, ministers, etc., or other agents are hereby required to receive any such information as aforesaid and to transmit the particulars thereof, without delay, to one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state, and to transmit copies of the same to the commanders of His Majesty's ships or vessels, then being in the said port or place' (o).

In February, 1845, the 'Felicidade,' a Brazilian schooner, bound on a voyage to Africa for the purpose of bringing back a cargo of slaves, arrived off the African coast, and was observed by Her Majesty's ship 'Wasp,' stationed off the slave coast for the prevention of the slave trade, who, upon approaching the 'Felicidade,' manned two boats, and gave the command of them to S., one of his officers, with orders to board the 'Felicidade,' and if she appeared to be fitted up for the slave trade to capture her. S., in obedience to these orders, went with the two boats to the 'Felicidade.' At the time of her capture the 'Felicidade' was fitted up for the reception of a cargo of slaves, and was within sixteen miles of the shore. The next day Captain Usher placed the 'Felicidade' under the command of S., and directed him to steer a particular course in pursuit of a vessel capable of being seen from the 'Wasp,' although then invisible from the 'Felicidade.' S. accordingly steered that course, and the next morning he descried the 'Echo,' a Brazilian brigantine. He chased and overtook the 'Echo' the next night within ten miles of the African coast, when and where she surrendered. S. had at that time under his command Palmer, a midshipman, and sixteen British seamen; he ordered P. and eight of the seamen to take charge of the 'Echo' during the night. On Mr. Palmer going on board the 'Echo,' he found in her a cargo of four hundred and thirty-four slaves. During the chase and at the time of the surrender, S. wore his uniform, and at the time of the surrender and capture told Serva, the captain of the 'Echo,' he was going to take them to Her Majesty's ship the 'Wasp,' for being engaged in the slave trade. The 'Wasp' had printed instructions on board. S. had not any printed instructions on board the 'Felicidade,' and did not shew any other authority than his uniform and the British ensign. He had, however, boarded the 'Echo' several times before, and to Serva was well known as an officer in Her Majesty's navy. The next morning after the capture S. placed P. and nine British seamen under his command on board the 'Felicidade,' in order that he might take charge of her and of Serva, M. (another of the crew of the 'Felicidade'), and several others of the 'Echo's' crew. Within an hour afterwards for condemnation or forfeiture of slaves illegally imported, for which there is no time limit. This section appears not to apply to offences within ss. 9, 10, 11.

(o) Ss. 41-46, 48-82 were repealed in 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 88, s. 30). S. 47 fixes a limitation of five years for indictments, information, &c., to recover penalties or forfeitures, except in case of proceedings

Serva, M., and some of the rest conspired together to kill all the English on board the 'Felicidade,' and take her; and in pursuance of that conspiracy rose upon P. and his men, and after a short conflict succeeded in killing them, M. having in the course of that conflict stabbed and thrown overboard P. On the trial of an indictment against Serva and others engaged with him in the transaction for the murder of Mr. Palmer, at Exeter Assizes, Platt, B., held that the 'Felicidade' was in the lawful custody of Her Majesty's officers, that all on board that vessel were within Her Majesty's Admiralty jurisdiction, and that if the prisoners plotted together to slay all the English on board and run away with the vessel, and in carrying their design into execution M. slew P., and the others were aiding and assisting in the commission of that act, they should be found guilty of murder; and upon a case reserved it was contended on the part of the prisoners that both the 'Felicidade' and 'Echo' were wrongfully taken, and that the prisoners had a right to regain their freedom by any means in their power, and consequently that no felony had been committed. It was answered on the part of the prosecution, that the 'Felicidade' and 'Echo' were lawfully taken under the Slave Trade Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 113), and 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 74 (p), and the Portuguese and Brazilian treaties as to slave trading; and that the prisoners were in lawful custody, and the 'Felicidade' in the lawful custody of the Queen's officers; but it was held that there was a want of jurisdiction in an English Court to try the murder committed on board the 'Felicidade'; and if the lawful possession of that vessel by the British Crown, through its officers, would be sufficient to give jurisdiction, there was no evidence brought before the Court to shew that the possession was lawful (q).

A count stated that the prisoner, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, did illegally and feloniously man, navigate, equip, despatch, use and employ a certain ship called the 'Augusta,' in order to accomplish a certain object, which (by 5 Geo. IV. c. 113, s. 10) was declared unlawful, viz., to deal and trade in slaves. The three following counts only varied from the first in describing the object of the several acts charged to have been done by the prisoner differently, as in the statute. It was objected that each count was bad as charging distinct felonies, the statute making it a felony to fit out, man, navigate, equip, despatch, use or employ any ship in order to accomplish any of the objects thereby declared unlawful, and each count charging the prisoner with having done all the acts before mentioned, each of which would have been of itself a felony, if done with the object stated in the Act. But the Court held that each count contained a charge of one felony only, the whole being alleged to have been done to accomplish one and the same single object, the essence of the felony consisting in using the means described in the Act to accomplish that object. It was also contended, that these counts were bad for not negating the exceptions in the Act of circumstances, which might render the transaction lawful; but it was held that these exceptions were virtually repealed by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 73, s. 12, and that for this purpose sect. 10 of the Act of 1824 must be considered as if they had never existed; and as the offences in the indictment were charged to have been committed in the reign of Queen Victoria, they must necessarily have been after the passing of the repealing Act. It was further objected, that the indictment did not allege that the prisoner was a British subject, or that the offence was committed within Her Majesty's dominions; but it was held that, as the offence was stated in each count to have been committed at London, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, and therefore prima facie at least within the Central Criminal Court district (r), the indictment did in substance allege the offence to have been committed within Her Majesty's dominions (s).

Upon an indictment under sect. 10 for feloniously fitting out a vessel for the purpose of dealing in slaves, it was held that the provisions of the Act were not confined to acts done by British subjects in furtherance of the slave trade in England or the British colonies, but applied to acts done by British subjects in furtherance of that trade in places not part of the British dominions. And in order to convict a party who is charged with having employed and loaded a vessel for the purpose of slave trading, it is not necessary to shew that the vessel which carried out the goods was intended to be used for bringing back slaves in return; but it was sufficient if there was a slave adventure, and the vessel was in any way engaged in that adventure (t).

Where a party residing in London was charged with having chartered a vessel and loaded goods on board, for the purpose of slave trading, it was held that slave trading papers found on board the vessel when she was seized off the coast of Africa, but not traced in any way to the knowledge of the prisoner, were not admissible in evidence against him (u).

The Slave Trade Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 98), recites sect. 2 of the Act of 1824 (v), and enacts (sect. 1) that 'all the provisions of the Slave Trade Act, 1824, hereinbefore recited and of this present Act shall from and after the coming into operation of this Act (August 24, 1823), be deemed to extend and apply to British subjects wheresoever residing or being, and whether within the dominions of the British Crown or of any foreign country; and all the several matters and things prohibited by the Slave Trade Act, 1824, or by this present Act when committed by British subjects, whether within the dominions of the British Crown or in any foreign country, . . . (w) shall be deemed and taken to be offences committed against the said several Acts respectively, and shall be dealt with and punished accordingly: provided nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall repeal or alter any of the provisions of the said Act' (x).

Sect. 4. 'In all cases of indictment or information laid or exhibited in the Court of Queen's Bench (High Court of Justice King's Bench Division) for misdemeanors or offences committed against the said Acts (of 1824 and 1833, ante, pp. 271 et seq.), or against the present Act in any places out of the United Kingdom, and within any British colony, settlement, plantation, or territory it shall and may be lawful for Her Majesty's said Court, upon motion to be made on behalf of the prosecutor or defendant, to award a writ or writs of mandamus, requiring the chief justice or other chief judicial officer in such colony, settlement, plantation, or territory, who are hereby authorised and required accordingly, to hold a Court, with all convenient speed for the examination of witnesses and receiving other proofs concerning the matters charged in such indictments or informations respectively, and in the meantime to cause public notice to be given of the holding of such Courts, and summonses to be issued for the attendance of witnesses and of agents and counsel of the parties; and such examination as aforesaid shall be then and there openly and publicly taken in the said Court viva voce upon the respective oaths of the persons examined, and be reduced to writing and be sent to Her Majesty in Her Court of Queen's Bench, in manner set forth and prescribed in the East India Company Act, 1772 (13 Geo. III. c. 63); and such depositions being duly taken and returned according to the true intent and meaning of this Act, shall be allowed and read, and shall be deemed as good and competent evidence as if such witnesses had been present and sworn and examined viva voce at any trial for such misdemeanors and offences as aforesaid in Her Majesty's said Court of Queen's Bench, any law or usage to the contrary thereof notwithstanding' (y).

There is nothing in the Acts of 1824 and 1833 to prohibit a contract by a British subject for the sale of slaves lawfully held by him in a foreign country, where the possession and the sale of slaves is legal. Where, therefore the defendants, British subjects, resident and domiciled in Great Britain, being possessed of certain slaves in the Brazils, where the purchase and holding of slaves is lawful, contracted with the plaintiff, a Brazilian subject, domiciled in the Brazils, to sell them to him, to be used and employed there, and some of the slaves had been purchased by the defendants in the Brazils after the passing of the Act of 1824, but before the Act of 1843 (z), for the purpose of being employed, and they were employed, in certain mines there, of which the defendants were the proprietors; and the rest of the slaves were their offspring, and were in the possession of the defendants before the passing of the latter Act; it was held that the contract was valid (a).

The Slave Trade Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 88), consolidates the laws for the suppression of the slave trade, and incorporates the unrepealed provisions of the Slave Trade Act, 1824 (already stated).

The term "Governor" includes the officer for the time being administering the government of any colony, and where there is a local governor or lieutenant-governor under a governor-general, means the local governor or lieutenant-governor: The term "foreign state" includes any foreign nation, people, tribe, sovereign, prince, chief, or headman: The term "vessel of a foreign state" means a vessel which is justly entitled to claim the protection of the flag of a foreign state, or which would be so entitled if she did not lose such protection by being engaged in the slave trade: The term "treaty" includes any convention, agreement, engagement, or arrangement: The term "slave trade," when used in relation to any particular treaty, does not include anything declared by such treaty not to be comprised in the term or in such treaty: The term "Vice-Admiralty Court" does not include any Vice-Admiralty Court which for the time being has under its commission a limited jurisdiction only in matters relating to the slave trade: The term "British Slave Court" means the High Court of Admiralty of England, every Vice-Admiralty Court in [His] Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom, and every East African Court for the time being within the meaning of the Slave Trade (East African Courts) Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 59): The term "Slave Court" means every British Slave Court, every mixed commission or Court established under any existing slave trade treaty, and the Court of any foreign state having jurisdiction to try and condemn a vessel engaged in the slave trade: The term "existing slave trade treaty" means a treaty made by or on behalf of [His] Majesty or his royal predecessors with any foreign state for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade and in force at the passing of this Act.'

Sect. 3 provides for the seizure of ships suspected (b) of being engaged in or fitted out for the slave trade, and for the seizure of vessels, slaves, persons, goods, and effects which may be forfeited under the above provisions. Sect. 4 and Schedule 1 provide for presumption that a vessel is engaged in the slave trade from the presence of certain specified particulars in its equipment. But the presumption does not extend to vessels of a foreign state, except so far as is consistent with the treaty made with such state. Sects. 5-8 provide the tribunal which is to try the right of seizure. Sects. 9 and 10 provide for the disposal of vessels and slaves which have been seized. Sects. 11-16 relate to bounties (c). By sect. 17 persons authorised to make seizures are to have the benefit of the protection granted to persons acting under the Imperial Customs Acts. By sect. 18 the pendency of proceedings under the Act in certain cases is made a bar to other legal proceedings. Sect. 19-21 apply to proceedings in the High Court of Justice in England (Admiralty Division) with respect to costs (d).

(d) S. 20 is repealed as to costs which can be taxed in a British possession, as from the commencement of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, in the possession, and as to Courts out of the King's dominion as from the commencement of an order applying the Act of 1890 to the Court (53 & 54 Vict. c. 27, s. 18). See Index to Statutory Rules and Orders (ed. 1907), tit. 'Foreign Jurisdiction.'

By sect. 22, 'Any person who wilfully gives false evidence in any proceeding taken in pursuance of this Act in any Slave Court shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable to the like penalty as if he had been guilty of perjury, or in a British possession, of the offence, by whatever name called which if committed in England would be perjury.'

By sect. 23 the registrar of a British Slave Court is to make returns of cases adjudged in such Court (e).

By sect. 24, 'This Act shall be construed as one with the enactments of the Slave Trade Act, 1824 (f), and any enactments amending the same (g), so far as they are in force at the time of the passing of this Act, and are not repealed by this Act; and the expression "this Act," when used in this Act, shall include those enactments.'

By sect. 25, 'All pecuniary forfeitures and penalties imposed by the said enactments, with which this Act is to be construed as one, may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered in any Court of record or of Vice-Admiralty in any part of His Majesty's dominions wherein the offence was committed, or where the offender may be, in like manner as any penalty or forfeiture incurred in the United Kingdom, under any Act for the time being in force relating to His Majesty's customs, or (in the case of the High Court of Admiralty, or of a Court of Vice-Admiralty), in like manner as any vessel seized in pursuance of this Act. Such pecuniary penalties and forfeitures shall, subject to the express provisions of the said enactments, be paid and applied in like manner as the net proceeds of a vessel seized otherwise than by the commander or officer of one of His Majesty's ships, or of the cruiser of a foreign state.'

Trial of Offences against the Act.—By sect. 26, 'Any offence against this Act, or the said enactments with which this Act is to be construed as one, or otherwise in connection with the slave trade, shall for all purposes of and incidental to the trial and punishment of a person guilty of such offence, and all proceedings and matters preliminary and incidental to and consequential on such trial and punishment, and for all purposes of and incidental to the jurisdiction of any Court, constable, and officer with reference to such offence, be deemed to have been committed, either in the place in which the offence was committed or in the county of Middlesex, or in any place in which the person guilty of the offence may for the time being be, either in His Majesty's dominions, or in any foreign port or place in which His Majesty has jurisdiction; and the offence may be described in any indictment or other document relating thereto, as having been committed at the place where it was wholly or partly committed, or as having been committed on the high seas, or out of His Majesty's dominions, and the venue or local description in the margin may be that of the place in which the trial is held.

'Where any such offence is commenced at one place and completed at another, the place at which such offence is to be deemed to have been committed shall be either the place where the offence was commenced or the place where the offence was completed.

(g) i.e. the Acts of 1833 and 1843, supra.

'Where a person being in one place is accessory to or aids or abets in any such offence committed in another place, the place at which such offence is to be deemed to have been committed shall be either the place in which the offence was actually committed or the place where the offender was at the time of his being so accessory aiding or abetting.

'Where it appears to any Court, or the judge of any Court having jurisdiction to try any such offence, that the removal of an offender charged with such offence to some other place in His Majesty's dominions for trial would be conducive to the interest of justice, such Court or judge may, by warrant or instrument in the nature of a warrant, direct such removal, and such offender may be removed and tried accordingly. And sect. 268 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (h), shall apply to the removal of an offender under this section in the same mannner as if the term "consular officer" (i), in that section included the Court or judge making such warrant or instrument.'

By sect. 27, offences against the Act or the incorporated enactments, or otherwise in connection with the slave trade, whether committed on the high seas or on land, or partly on the high seas and partly on land are to be deemed to be included as extradition crimes in the first schedule of the Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), and that Act and any Act amending it are to be construed accordingly.

By sect. 28 the Act is applied to all cases of vessels, slaves, goods, and effects seized and adjudicated upon by any Slave Court, whether before or after the passing of the Act (j). Sect. 29 extends the Act to future treaties with any foreign state in relation to the slave trade if an Order in Council be obtained for that purpose (k).

(l) This Act applies retrospectively to cases already adjudicated (s. 6). S. 3 gives jurisdiction where the vessel seized is British or is seized under an existing treaty or is not shewn to be entitled to claim the protection of the flag of any foreign state : and in the case of a British vessel, whether it is brought in by a British ship or by the commander of a foreign state party to the treaty (42 & 43 Vict. c. 38, s. 4).

as amended by the Slave Trade (East African Courts) Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 38), regulates and extends the jurisdiction in matters connected with the slave trade of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Aden, and of His Majesty's consular officers within the dominions of the sovereigns of Zanzibar (m), Muscat (n), and Madagascar (o), upon whom jurisdiction had been, or should be, conferred by Order in Council in relation to vessels captured on suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade or otherwise in relation to that trade. The Acts apply to existing and future treaties with the powers named or with Egypt (p), or any other foreign nation, people, tribe, sovereign, prince, chief, or headman in Arabia or East Africa, or the coasts of the Persian Gulf (sect. 7).

By the Slave Trade Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 46), s. 1, it is provided that a subject of the King, or of any Prince or State in India in alliance with the King, may be dealt with and punished in any place in British India where he is found for committing or abetting offences against sects. 367, 370, 371 of the Indian Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860) (q), or any subsequent amendment of these sections (r), committed upon the high seas or in any part of Asia or Africa, specified in the Order in Council. By sect. 3, High Courts in India are given, for the purpose of obtaining evidence for the trial of such cases, the powers given to the Court of Queen's Bench by sect. 4 of the Slave Trade Act, 1843 (s) as to British possessions where a witness may be, and as to consular officers in the specified parts of Asia or Africa the powers given by sect. 330 of the Indian Criminal Procedure Code, Act X. of 1872 (t).

By Order in Council of April 30, 1877 (u), the above Act was applied to certain portions of Asia and Africa, viz., the territories of the Khan of Khelat, and of the Sultan of Muscat in Mekran and Arabia, the coasts of Beloochistan, and of the Bunder Abbas district, and the shores of the Persian Gulf, the coast of Arabia from Ras Mussendom to Cape Babel Mandeb, the territories of certain specified tribes near Aden, the coast of Africa from Ras Sejarne to Delagoa Bay, the territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar, and the sea and islands within 10 degrees of latitude or longitude from such coasts and shores respectively (v).

By the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 27), s. 2, subs. 3 (b), a Colonial Court of Admiralty has under the Slave Trade Act, 1873, and any enactment relating to the slave trade (w) the jurisdiction thereby conferred in a Vice-Admiralty Court, but by subs. 3 has not jurisdiction under the Act of 1890 to try or punish a person for an offence which, according to the law of England, is punishable on indictment. The Act may be applied by Order in Council to Courts under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 37) (x).

The criminal jurisdiction of Colonial Courts with reference to the slave trade offences arising outside the land and sea limits of the Colony depends on the Acts of 1824 and 1873, supra.

The Act of 1890, c. 27, s. 9, authorises the King by commission under the Great Seal to establish Vice-Admiralty Courts (y) in any British possession. In British India and Colonies having a representative legislature, the Courts thus created may not exercise jurisdiction, except for certain purposes relating to prize, the royal navy, the slave trade, to the Pacific Islanders Protection Acts, 1872 and 1875, the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, or to matters on which questions arise relating to treaties or conventions with foreign countries, or to international law.

SECT. II.—THE PACIFIC ISLANDERS PROTECTION ACTS.

By sect. 9 of the Pacific Islanders Protection Act, 1872 (z) (sometimes described as the Kidnapping Act), certain offences by British subjects in the nature of kidnapping or enslaving 'natives of islands in the Pacific Ocean, not being within the King's dominions nor within the jurisdiction of any civilised power,' are declared felony. The Supreme Courts of the Australian States (a) and the Dominion of New Zealand, and Fiji (b) are empowered to try the offences and to inflict, at the discretion of the Court, the highest punishment short of death, or any less punishment for felony awarded by the law of the colony where the trial takes place. Persons who aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of such offences may be tried and punished as principal offenders (sect. 10). In indictments for such offences the offence may be described as committed at the place where it was wholly or partly committed, or may be averred generally as committed within the King's dominions, and the venue or local description in the margin of the indictment may be that of the place where the trial is held (sect. 11) (c).

The Act contained provisions (sects. 3-5) as to licences authorising the carrying of native labourers, amended in 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 51, s. 2), which are now ineffective so far as concerns Australia, by the stoppage of Polynesian immigration.

Courts of New South Wales and Tasmania under the Australian Courts Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 83).

(b) Added by the Act of 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 51) s. 8.

(c) Ss. 12-15 deal with the obtaining of evidence. Ss. 16, 17 give power to seize suspected British vessels. The vessels can be adjudicated upon by the Admiralty Courts in England or Colonial Vice-Admiralty Courts (38 & 39 Vict. c. 51, ss. 4, 5; 53 & 54 Vict. c. 27, s. 9).

The Pacific Islanders Protection Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 51), authorises His Majesty to exercise jurisdiction over British subjects in islands and places in the Pacific Ocean not within the King's dominions, and by Order in Council to create a Court of justice with criminal jurisdiction over British subjects within such islands and places, with power to take cognisance of all crimes and offences committed by British subjects 'within any of the said islands and places, or in any haven, river, creek, or place within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty' (sect. 6) (d) . . . and to vest such jurisdiction or any part thereof in a designated Court of a British Colony, and provide for the transmission of such offenders to the colony for trial and punishment, and for the admission in evidence of depositions taken in such islands and places.

The Acts of 1872 and 1875 took effect in the Australasian Colonies on proclamation by the Governors (35 & 36 Vict. c. 19, s. 21 (rep.) ; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 51, s. 10).

Under the above Acts and the British Settlements Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 54), and the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 37), an Order in Council was made, March 15, 1893, by sect. 13 whereof jurisdiction as to all matters and questions arising under the Pacific Islanders Protection Acts, 1872 and 1875, is subject to the provisions of the Order vested in and exercisable by the Court of the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific (e), which consists of the High Commissioner, the Chief Justices and other judges of the Supreme Court of Fiji, and the deputy commissioners (f). The Order contains provisions (g) as to procedure and jurisdiction, which include adaptations of the Admiralty Offences Colonial Acts of 1849 and 1860 (h).

On an indictment tried in Queensland for an offence against sect. 9 of the Act of 1872, the question arose whether the island of Malayta was part of the dominions of the British Crown or within the jurisdiction of any civilised power. The judge, on reference to the Pacific Order in Council of 1893, decided that it was part of the law, and that it applied to Malayta with other islands as not being within the jurisdiction or protectorate of any civilised power (i). In the same case it was held that if the Crown made a prima facie case of suspicion, the burden lay on the accused to prove that the natives were taken from their islands with their own consent.

(d) Admiralty jurisdiction might also be conferred. But see 53 & 54 Vict. c. 27, ss. 16, 18.

tectorates: Tonga or Friendly Islands, Union Group, Ellice and Gilbert Islands, and Southern Solomon's: and (jointly with France) the New Hebrides, including Banks Islands and Torres Islands.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF SERVING FOREIGN STATES AND BREACHES OF NEUTRALITY.

A. COMMON LAW AND EARLIER STATUTES.

ACCORDING to the old authorities the King is entitled to call on all the lieges to defend the realm and to prevent their withdrawal from the realm (a) ; and disobedience to the King's letter to a subject commanding him to return from beyond the seas, or to the King's writ of ne exeat regno, commanding a subject to stay at home, is a high misprision and contempt (b). And it is also a high offence to refuse to assist the King for the good of the state, either in councils, by advice, if called upon, or in war by personal service for the defence of the realm against rebellion or invasion (c) ; and all persons under the degree of nobility who are fifteen years of age and able to travel are liable to punishment for neglecting to join the posse comitatus (d).

Entering into the service of a foreign state without the consent of the King, or contracting with a foreign state any engagement which subjects the party to an influence or control inconsistent with the allegiance due to our own sovereign, is said to be a misdemeanor indictable at common law (e), and where the foreign state is at war with Great Britain is treason (f). Indeed it is considered as so high an offence to prefer the interests of a foreign state to that of our own, that any act is said to be criminal which may but incline a man to do so ; as to receive a pension from a foreign prince without the leave of the King (g).

Early Statutes.

By an Act of 1605 (3 Jac. I. c. 4, s. 18) (h), it was made felony to go out of the realm to serve foreign states without first taking the oath of allegiance and entering into a bond against reconciliation with the Pope or plots against the King. The oath prescribed by the Act of 1605 was modified in 1688 (1 Will. & M. st. 1, c. 8). Under the Act of 1605 it was considered, that if a party went out of the realm with intent to serve a foreign state, although there was no service in fact; or if a party did actually so serve, though he did not go over for that purpose, but upon some other occasion, it was within the statute (i).

(d) Neglect to join the posse comitatus, if required by the sheriffs or the justices, is a misdemeanor. 2 Hen. V. stat. 1, c. 8. And as to arrest of felons, see 50 & 51 Vict. c. 55, s. 8 (1). The posse comitatus is now summoned, if at all, only for the arrest of felons or suppression of riots (post, p. 431).

By Acts of 1736 (9 Geo. II. c. 30), and 1756 (29 Geo. II. c. 17), it was made felony without benefit of clergy to enlist, or procure any person to go abroad to enlist, as a soldier in the service of any foreign prince, state, or potentate. These Acts were directed against the enlistment by foreign powers of Catholics or Jacobites (i).

Of Breaches of Neutrality.

It appears not to have been an offence at common law for British subjects to enter into the service of belligerent powers at peace with Great Britain, unless the act involved a breach of duty to the King (j).

In the United States legislation was passed in 1794 and 1818 to prevent aid by American citizens to foreign belligerents.

Act of 1819.—In 1819 was passed an Act (59 Geo. III. c. 69) framed on the United States Act of 1818. The preamble recites that, ‘The enlistment or engagement of His Majesty’s subjects to serve in war in foreign service, without His Majesty’s licence, and the fitting out or arming of vessels by His Majesty’s subjects, without His Majesty’s licence, for warlike operations in or against the dominions of any Foreign Prince, State, potentate, or persons exercising or assuming to exercise the powers of Government in or over any Foreign Country, Colony, Province, or part of any Province (k), or against the ships, goods, or merchandise of any Foreign Prince, potentate, or persons as aforesaid, or their subjects, may be prejudicial to and tend to endanger the peace and welfare of this Kingdom’; and that ‘the laws in force are not sufficiently effectual for preventing the same.’

In R. v. Jones (l), on an indictment (under 59 Geo. III. c. 69), for engaging and procuring at Liverpool men to enlist as sailors in the Confederate service, it appeared that the men had been induced by the defendants to sign articles at Liverpool to serve in the ‘Japan’ on a voyage to China, and they embarked on board her, and she sailed to the British Channel, and anchored off Brest, and the next day a captain of the Confederate navy enlisted the men in that service. Cockburn, C.J., held that the question was, whether the defendants procured the sailors to embark at Liverpool for the purpose of their being employed in the service of the Confederate States. If they procured the sailors to embark on board the ‘Japan’ and sail to a foreign country, to be there enlisted in the Confederate service, they were guilty, and it was sufficient if that was the intention of the defendants, although the men themselves did not go with that intention.

(j) Vide supra, p. 285.

(k) The first effect, if not the object, of this Act was to prevent British subjects from engaging in the revolt of the Spanish American colonies. The words in italics were clearly intended to have this effect. See 40 Parl. Deb. (1st series), 1084, 1091. The ‘Salvador’ [1870], L. R. 3 P.C. 218, 231.

(l) 4 F. & F. 25.

In R. v. Rumble (m), the indictment (under 59 Geo. III. c. 69) contained counts for causing, &c., men to enlist in the Confederate service as sailors, &c., and for counselling men here to enlist in that service abroad, and for assisting the equipment of a vessel for that service. An old iron steam gunboat dismantled of all her guns and warlike equipments, and stripped of her armour-plates, masts, spars, and sails, and with only her engines and boilers in her, was sold by the Government to a firm, who bought her with a view to her being engaged in the Confederate service. Leave was obtained from the Admiralty to have the vessel docked and repaired at Sheerness, and the defendant, who was one of the dockyard officials, had rendered every assistance. There were no warlike equipments done, but mere repairs or fittings as a mercantile vessel. The defendant had held himself out as engaging men on board the vessel for a trial trip previously to her going on a voyage to China, and had engaged men, or sent them on board to be engaged, as stokers, firemen, or engineers; but none of the men had any other idea than that the vessel was destined for China. The vessel went to Calais, and there the Confederate flag was hoisted, and officers came on board and took the command of her as a Confederate vessel, and the men were invited to enlist in the Confederate service, but most of them declined. The defendant was on board whilst the Confederate flag was flying, in company with the officers, and when he came back to Sheerness he continued to interest himself in sending men over for the service of the vessel, though only in connection with the locomotive power. The jury were directed—1. That the main question was, whether the defendant was a party to the engagement of the men with a view to enlistment in the Confederate service. 2. That the acts of the defendant after he must have been aware of the destination of the vessel, though not the subject-matter of the indictment, might be taken into consideration as throwing light upon the intention with which he did the acts in the earlier part of the transaction, which were the subject-matter of the indictment. 3. That the trifling repairs done to the engines, &c., did not amount to an equipment. 4. That if the defendant procured the men to enter into engagements nominally for a trial trip, but with the ulterior purpose on his part of getting them into a position in which they might be induced to enlist in the Confederate service, the defendant was guilty, but if his object in engaging the men was simply that the vessel should go out on a trial trip and come back, he was not guilty. 5. That the term ‘sailors’ in the statute included persons engaged as stokers, firemen, and engineers, for the purpose of navigating the vessel. 6. That there must be a hiring or enlistment in the United Kingdom to bring the case within the statute. 7. That such an offence must have been committed in England, or the offence of counselling its commission was not proved (n).

The building in pursuance of a contract, with intention to sell and deliver to a belligerent power, the hull of a vessel suitable for war, but unarmed and not equipped, or fitted out with anything which enables her to cruise or commit hostilities, or do any warlike act whatever, was not a violation of 59 Geo. III. c. 69. The equipment forbidden by that Act was an equipment of such warlike character as enables a ship on leaving a port of this kingdom to cruise or commit hostilities. (Per Pollock, C.B., and Bramwell, B.) If the character of equipment is doubtful, it may be explained by evidence of the intent of the parties. The Act includes a case where the equipment is such that, although the ship when it leaves a port in this kingdom is not in a condition at once to commit hostilities, it is yet capable of being used for war, and the intent is clear that it is to be used for war. (Per Channell, B.) Any act of equipping, furnishing, or fitting out done to the hull or vessel, of whatever nature or character that act may be if done with the prohibited intent, is within, the statute. (Per Pigott, B.) On the trial of an information respecting the seizure of a vessel in a port at Liverpool for an alleged violation of the Act for equipping her for the service of a belligerent state, Bramwell, B., was of opinion, that a right direction would be, that if the jury were satisfied that the parties concerned were equipping, or arming, or attempting to equip or arm, the ship claimed, with intent that it should be employed in the service of a foreign power to cruise or commit hostilities against others as alleged, they should find for the Crown; but such equipment or attempted equipment must be of a warlike character, so that by means of it the ship was in a condition more or less effective to cruise or commit hostilities; otherwise they must find for the claimants. Channell, B., was of opinion that the questions left to the jury should have been—1. Was there an intent, on the part of any one having a controlling power over the vessel, that she should be employed in the service of the Confederate States, to cruise or commit hostilities against the United States? 2. If so, was she equipped, fitted out, or furnished in a British port in order to be employed to cruise, &c.? 3. If not equipped, was there any attempt to equip her in a British port in order that she should be so employed? 4. Or did any one knowingly assist, &c., in such equipment in a British port? Pigott, B., said that the jury should have been directed to see—1. Whether the equippers or the purchasers had the prohibited intent; and, 2. Whether with such intent they had done any act towards equipping, furnishing, or fitting out the ship, beyond the mere work of building the hull of the vessel, or had attempted to do so (o).

B. THE FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT, 1870.

In consequence of the defects in the Act of 1819, revealed by the decision in Attorney-General v. Sillem (ubi sup.), and of the report of a Royal Commission in 1867 (p), that Act was repealed on the outbreak of the Franco-German War in 1870, and was replaced by the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90) now in force. The preamble of that Act recites 'that it is expedient to make provision for the regulation of the conduct of His Majesty's subjects during the existence of hostilities between foreign states with which His Majesty is at peace.' The Act of 1870 extends to 'all the dominions of the King, including the adjacent territorial waters' (sect. 2) (q), and has been held to apply to British subjects everywhere, whether within the King's dominions or not (r), and to foreign subjects within the King's dominions (s). It came into operation in the United Kingdom immediately on its passing (August 9, 1870), 'and shall be proclaimed in every British possession by the Governor thereof as soon as may be after he receives notice of this Act, and shall come into operation in that British possession on the day of such proclamation' (sect. 3).

An indictment alleging that certain offences against the Act had been committed within the limits of Her Majesty's dominions and after the coming into operation of the Act, sufficiently avers the Act to have been in force in that part of Her Majesty's dominions in which the offences were alleged to have been committed. But proof must be given where necessary of proclamation in a British possession, e.g., in one acquired after August 9, 1870 (t).

Illegal Enlistment.—By sect. 4, 'if any person (u), without the licence of His Majesty (v), being a British subject, within or without His Majesty's dominions, accepts or agrees to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any foreign state at peace with His Majesty (vv), and in this Act referred to as a friendly state, or, whether a British subject or not, within His Majesty's dominions, induces any other person to accept or agree to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any such foreign state as aforesaid—

'He shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable' as stated post, p. 292.

Sect. 5. 'If any person, without the licence of His Majesty, being a British subject, quits or goes on board any ship with a view of quitting His Majesty's dominions, with intent to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with a friendly state, or, whether a British subject or not, within His Majesty's dominions, induces any other person to quit or to go on board any ship with a view of quitting His Majesty's dominions with the like intent, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable' as stated post, p. 292.

Sect. 6. 'If any person induces any other person to quit His Majesty's dominions or to embark on any ship within His Majesty's dominions under a misrepresentation or false representation of the service in which such person is to be engaged, with the intent or in order that such person may accept or agree to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with a friendly state, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable' as stated post, p. 292.

board or has on board such ship within His Majesty's dominions any of the following persons, in this Act referred to as illegally enlisted persons ; that is to say—

(1) ' Any person who, being a British subject within or without the dominions of His Majesty, has, without the licence of His Majesty, accepted or agreed to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state ;

(2) ' Any person, being a British subject, who, without the licence of His Majesty, is about to quit His Majesty's dominions with intent to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with a friendly state ;

(3) ' Any person who has been induced to embark under a misrepresentation or false representation of the service in which such person is to be engaged, with the intent or in order that such person may accept or agree to accept any commission or engagement in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with a friendly state ;

' Such master or owner shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and the following consequences shall ensue ; that is to say,

(1) ' The offender shall be punishable ' as stated post, p. 292.

(2) ' Such ship shall be detained until the trial and conviction or acquittal of the master or owner, and until all penalties inflicted on the master or owner have been paid, or the master or owner has given security for the payment of such penalties to the satisfaction of two justices of the peace, or other magistrate or magistrates having the authority of two justices of the peace ; ' and

(3) ' All illegally enlisted persons shall immediately on the discovery of the offence be taken on shore, and shall not be allowed to return to the ship.'

Illegal Shipbuilding and Illegal Operations.—Sect. 8. ' If any person within His Majesty's dominions, without the licence of His Majesty, does any of the following acts ; that is to say—

(1) ' Builds or agrees to build, or causes to be built any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state : or

(2) ' Issues or delivers any commission for any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state : or

(3) ' Equips any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state : or

(4) ' Despatches, or causes or allows to be despatched, any ship with intent or knowledge, or having reasonable cause to believe that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state ;

' Such person shall be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act, and the following consequences shall ensue :

(1) ' The offender shall be punishable ' as stated post, p. 292.

(2) 'The ship in respect of which any such offence is committed, and her equipment shall be forfeited to His Majesty' (w) :

'Provided that a person building, causing to be built, or equipping a ship in any of the cases aforesaid, in pursuance of a contract made before the commencement of such war as aforesaid, shall not be liable to any of the penalties imposed by this section in respect of such building or equipping if he satisfies the conditions following : (that is to say),

(1) 'If forthwith upon a proclamation of neutrality being issued by His Majesty he gives notice to the Secretary of State, that he is so building, causing to be built, or equipping such ship, and furnishes such particulars of the contract and of any matters relating to, or done, or to be done under the contract as may be required by the Secretary of State :

(2) 'If he gives such security, and takes and permits to be taken such other measures, if any, as the Secretary of State may prescribe for ensuring that such ship shall not be despatched, delivered, or removed without the licence of His Majesty until the termination of such war as aforesaid.'

Sect. 9. 'Where any ship is built by order of or on behalf of any foreign state when at war with a friendly state, or is delivered to or to the order of such foreign state, or any person who to the knowledge of the person building is an agent of such foreign state, or is paid for by such foreign state or such agent, and is employed in the military or naval service of such foreign state, such ship shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to have been built with a view to being so employed, and the burden shall lie on the builder of such ship of proving that he did not know that the ship was intended to be so employed in the military or naval service of such foreign state.'

Sect. 10. 'If any person within the dominions of His Majesty, and without the licence of His Majesty,—

'By adding to the number of the guns, or by changing those on board for other guns, or by the addition of any equipment for war, increases or augments, or procures to be increased or augmented, or is knowingly concerned in increasing or augmenting the warlike force of any ship which at the time of her being within the dominions of His Majesty was a ship in the military or naval service of any foreign state at war with any friendly state,—such person shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable' as stated post, p. 292.

Sect. 11. 'If any person within the limits of His Majesty's dominions, and without the licence of His Majesty,— 'Prepares or fits out any naval or military expedition to proceed against the dominions of any friendly state, the following consequences shall ensue :

(1) 'Every person engaged in such preparation or fitting out, or

(w) Under this provision, in the 'Gauntlet,' L. R. 4 P.C. 184, a British steam tug was forfeited to the Crown for towing a prize taken by the French from the Germans from British territorial waters into French territorial waters. The judicial committee held that the engagement of the tug for the purposes above stated, amounted to despatching a ship for the purpose of taking part in the naval service of a belligerent.

assisting therein, or employed in any capacity in such expedition, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable' as stated infra.

(2) 'All ships, and their equipments, and all arms and munitions of war, used in or forming part of such expedition, shall be forfeited to His Majesty.'

The offence created by this section is constituted by the purchase of guns and ammunition in this country and their shipment for a foreign port for the purpose of there being put on board a ship, with the knowledge of the purchaser and shipper that they are to be used in a hostile demonstration against such state, though the shipper takes no part in any overt act of war, and the ship is not fully equipped for the expedition within any port belonging to the King's dominions (x).

Where an expedition in contravention of this section is prepared by any person within the King's dominions, any British subject who assists in the preparation is guilty of an offence against the Act, even if his assistance is rendered from a place without the King's dominions (y).

Sect. 12. 'Any person who aids, abets, counsels, or procures the commission of any offence against this Act shall be liable to be tried and punished as a principal offender.'

Punishment.—Each of the sects. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, and 11 provides that an offence under the section shall be 'punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the Court before which the offender is convicted; and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour.'

By sect. 13, 'The term of imprisonment to be awarded in respect of any offence against this Act shall not exceed two years.'

Legal Procedure.—Sect. 16. 'Any offence against this Act shall, for all purposes of and incidental to the trial and punishment of any person guilty of any such offence, be deemed to have been committed either in the place in which the offence was wholly or partly committed, or in any place within His Majesty's dominions in which the person who committed such offence may be' (z).

Sect. 17. 'Any offence against this Act may be described in any indictment or other document relating to such offence, in cases where the mode of trial requires such a description, as having been committed at the place where it was wholly or partly committed, or it may be averred generally to have been committed within His Majesty's dominions, and the venue or local description in the margin may be that of the county, city, or place in which the trial is held.'

Sect. 18. 'The following authorities, that is to say, in the United Kingdom, any judge of a superior Court, in any other place within the jurisdiction of any British Court of justice, such Court or, if there are more Courts than one, the Court having the highest criminal jurisdiction in that place, may, by warrant or instrument in the nature of a warrant in this section included in the term "warrant," direct that any offender charged with an offence against this Act shall be removed to some other place in His Majesty's dominions for trial, in cases where it appears to the authority granting the warrant that the removal of such offender would be conducive to the interests of justice, and any prisoner so removed shall be triable at the place to which he is removed, in the same manner as if his offence had been committed at such place.

'Any warrant for the purposes of this section may be addressed to the master of any ship or to any other person or persons, and the person or persons to whom such warrant is addressed shall have power to convey the prisoner therein named to any place or places named in such warrant, and to deliver him, when arrived at such place or places, into the custody of any authority designated by such warrant.

'Every prisoner shall, during the time of his removal under any such warrant as aforesaid, be deemed to be in the legal custody of the person or persons empowered to remove him.'

Sect. 19 directs how proceedings are to be taken for the condemnation and forfeiture of a ship, &c., for offences against the Act.

Sect. 20. 'Where any offence against this Act has been committed by any person by reason whereof a ship, or ship and equipment, or arms and munitions of war, has or have become liable to forfeiture, proceedings may be instituted contemporaneously or not, as may be thought fit, against the offender in any Court having jurisdiction of the offence, and against the ship, or ship and equipment, or arms and munitions of war, for the forfeiture in the Court of Admiralty; but it shall not be necessary to take proceedings against the offender because proceedings are instituted for the forfeiture, or to take proceedings for the forfeiture because proceedings are taken against the offender.'

Sect. 14 provides for the restoration of illegal prizes brought into British ports.

Sect. 15 provides that for the purposes of this Act a licence by His Majesty shall be under the sign manual of His Majesty or be signified by Order in Council or by proclamation of His Majesty.

Sects. 21-26, and the following sections, enact that the Secretary of State and certain other persons, including the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland and the Governors or Lieutenant-Governors of Man, the Channel Islands, and British possessions (sect. 26), may seize or detain any ship liable to be seized or detained in pursuance of this Act, and give them certain powers for such purpose. If there is no reasonable and probable cause for the detention, the High Court Admiralty Division may release the ship and order indemnity to the owner (sect. 23) (a).

Sect. 27 gives an appeal from decisions of a Court of Admiralty under the Act or in other Admiralty cases.

Sect. 28 gives an indemnity to officers and local authorities in respect of the seizure and detention of ships.

(a) In the 'International' [1871], L. R. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 321, release was ordered of a British ship, which during the Franco-German war was laying a submarine telegraph cable, under contract with the French Government, on the ground that the task on which the ship was engaged was not military or naval service within the Act, as the cable was not being laid expressly for furtherance of military operations.

Sect. 29. 'The Secretary of State shall not, nor shall the chief (b) executive authority be responsible in any action or other legal proceedings whatsoever for any warrant issued by him in pursuance of this Act, or be examinable as a witness, except at his own request, in any Court of justice in respect of the circumstances which led to the issue of the warrant.'

Interpretation.—Sect. 30. 'In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following terms have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them ; that is to say,

"FOREIGN STATE" includes any foreign prince, colony, province or part of any province or people, or any person or persons exercising or assuming to exercise the powers of government in or over any foreign country, colony, province, or part of any province or people (c) :

"MILITARY SERVICE" shall include military telegraphy (d) and any other employment whatever, in or in connection with any military operation :

"NAVAL SERVICE" shall, as respects a person, include service as a marine, employment as a pilot in piloting or directing the course of a ship of war or other ship when such ship of war or other ship is being used in any military or naval operation, and any employment whatever on board a ship of war, transport, store ship, privateer or ship under letters of marque ; and as respects a ship, include any user of a ship as a transport, store ship, privateer or ship under letters of marque :

"UNITED KINGDOM" includes the Isle of Man, the Channel Islands, and other adjacent islands :

"BRITISH POSSESSION" means any territory, colony, or place being part of His Majesty's dominions, and not part of the United Kingdom, as defined by this Act :

"THE SECRETARY OF STATE" shall mean any one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State :

"THE GOVERNOR" shall as respects India mean the Governor General or the Governor of any presidency, and where a British possession consists of several constituent colonies, mean the Governor General of the whole possession or the Governor of any of the constituent colonies, and as respects any other British possession it shall mean the officer for the time being administering the government of such possession ; also any person acting for or in the capacity of a governor shall be included under the term "Governor" :

"COURT OF ADMIRALTY" shall mean the High Court of Admiralty of England or Ireland (e), the Court of Session of Scotland, or any Vice-Admiralty Court within His Majesty's dominions :

"SHIP" shall include any description of boat, vessel, floating battery, or floating craft ; also any description of boat, vessel, or other craft or battery, made to move either on the surface of or under water, or sometimes on the surface of and sometimes under water :

"BUILDING" in relation to a ship shall include the doing any act towards or incidental to the construction of a ship, and all words having relation to building shall be construed accordingly :

“EQUIPPING” in relation to a ship shall include the furnishing a ship with any tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions, arms, munitions, or stores, or any other thing which is used in or about a ship for the purpose of fitting or adapting her for the sea or for naval service, and all words relating to equipment shall be construed accordingly :

“SHIP AND EQUIPMENT” shall include a ship and everything in or belonging to a ship :

“MASTER” shall include any person having the charge or command of a ship.’

It must be noted that most of these definitions contain the word ‘include,’ and do not restrict the words used in the prohibitory sections to the matters specifically mentioned in the definition (f).

Sect. 32. ‘Nothing in this Act contained shall subject to forfeiture any commissioned ship of any foreign state (g), or give to any British Court over or in respect of any ship entitled to recognition as a commissioned ship of any foreign state any jurisdiction which it would not have had if this Act had not passed’ (h).

Sect. 33. ‘Nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to subject to any penalty any person who enters into the military service of any prince, state, or potentate in Asia, with such leave or licence as is for the time being required by law in the case of subjects of His Majesty entering into the military service of princes, states, or potentates in Asia’ (i).

It was held that the Act of 1819 created an offence against the State, and the Court (of Queen’s Bench) refused to grant a criminal information for such offence on the application of a private prosecutor, leaving the case to be dealt with like other public offences (j).

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

PUBLICATIONS CALCULATED TO INTERFERE WITH PEACEFUL RELATIONS WITH FOREIGN STATES.

UPON the ground that malicious and scurrilous reflections upon foreign sovereigns or their representatives may tend to involve this country in disputes, animosities, and warfare, it has been held that publications tending to degrade and defame such persons are indictable. Thus an information was filed, by the command of the Crown, for a libel on the French ambassador at the British court, consisting principally of angry reflections on his public conduct and fitness, and charging him with ignorance in his official capacity, and with having used stratagems to supplant and depreciate the defendant at the court of Versailles (a). Lord George Gordon was found guilty upon an information for having published severe reflections upon the Queen of France, in which she was represented as the leader of a faction, and on the French ambassador in London. Ashhurst, J., in passing sentence, said that the object of the publication being to rekindle animosities between England and France by the personal abuse of the sovereign of one of them, it was highly necessary to repress an offence of so dangerous a nature: and that such libels might be supposed to have been made with the connivance of the state where they were published, unless the authors were subjected to punishment (b). A defendant was found guilty upon an information charging him with having published the following libel: 'The Emperor of Russia is rendering himself obnoxious to his subjects by various acts of tyranny, and ridiculous in the eyes of Europe by his inconsistency. He has lately passed an edict to prohibit the exportation of deals and other naval stores. In consequence of this ill-judged law, a hundred sail of vessels are likely to return to this country without freight' (c). And where the defendant was charged by an information with a libel upon Napoleon Buonaparte, Ellenborough, C.J., said to the jury: 'I lay it down as law, that any publication which tends to degrade, revile, and defame persons in considerable situations of power and dignity in foreign countries, may be taken to be and treated as a libel; and particularly when it has a tendency to interrupt the pacific relations between the two countries' (d).

Holt on Libel, 78; 2 Starkie on Libel, 218. The defendant was convicted, but was never called upon to receive judgment. At the time of the prosecution there was peace between England and France. Soon after the trial war broke out again.

In R. v. Most (e) the defendant was convicted upon an indictment containing counts for libels on the sovereigns of Europe, published in a newspaper, encouraging assassination, and intended to create discord between the Queen and the said sovereigns. A case was stated on the sufficiency of this and other counts in the indictment. The conviction was affirmed with reference to counts charging incitement to assassination (f). Coleridge, L.C.J., said: 'This is not the less an endeavour to persuade, or an encouragement, to murder either named individuals or unnamed individuals because it is under another aspect of the law a seditious and scandalous libel' (g).

In R. v. Antonelli (h), Phillimore, J., said: 'Libels which bring persons into hatred or contempt may apply to persons outside the dominions of the King, because they are liable to bring the peaceful relations between states to an end. So Lord George Gordon was tried and punished for libelling Marie Antoinette, Queen of France' (i). But he added: 'Seditious libels are such as tend to disturb the government of this country, and in my opinion a document published here, which was calculated to disturb the government of some foreign country, is not a seditious libel, nor punishable as a libel at all. . . . To hold otherwise would be to hold that all the strong language used against the government of Turkey at the time of the Bulgarian rebellion was seditious libel, and it would make many of our great statesmen guilty of seditious libel, and those persons also who espoused the cause of Italian liberty.'

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

VIOLATION OF DIPLOMATIC PRIVILEGES.

By the Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708 (7 Anne, c. 12 (a)), s. 3, ‘ . . . all writs and processes that shall at any time hereafter be sued forth or prosecuted, whereby the person of any ambassador or other public minister of any foreign prince or state, authorised and received as such by Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or the domestic or domestic servant of any such ambassador or other public minister may be arrested or imprisoned, or his or their goods or chattels may be distrained, seized or attached, shall be deemed and adjudged to be utterly null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.’

By sect. 4, ‘ . . . In case any person or persons shall presume to sue forth or prosecute any such writ or process, such person and persons and all attorneys and solicitors prosecuting and soliciting in such case, and all officers executing any such writ or process, being thereof convicted by the confession of the party or by the oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses before the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen’s Bench, the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, for the time being, or any two of them, shall be deemed violators of the laws of nations and disturbers of the public repose, and shall suffer such pains, penalties, and corporal punishments as the said Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper and the said Chief Justices, or any two of them, shall judge fit to be imposed and inflicted.’

Sect. 5 excludes from the benefit of the Act any merchant or other trader within the bankruptcy statutes who ‘shall put himself into the service of any such ambassador or public minister.’ And sect. 6 prohibits proceedings for arresting the servant of an ambassador, unless the name of the servant is first registered in the office of one of the principal secretaries of state, and by him transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex.

There is no recorded case of a prosecution for breach of this Act : and consequently it has not been determined whether the expressions ‘writ or process’ are limited to civil proceedings or extend to criminal process. The Act is regarded as declaratory of the common law with reference to the privilege of diplomatic officers (b) and their suites. The immunity

(a) This statute, sometimes described as the Act of Apology, was passed in consequence of the arrest on civil process of the ambassador of Peter the Great to the Court of St. James’. See Phillimore Int. Law (2nd ed.), vol. ii. p. 228 ; Halleck Int. Law (4th ed.), vol. i. p. 362 ; Hall Int. Law (5th ed.) 172 ; Law Magazine (4th series), vol. xx. p. 43. There is in force in the United States a statute based on the Act of Anne : U. S. Rev. Stat. ss. 4062-4065, originally framed in 1790. See U. S. v. Ortega [1826], 11 Wheaton U. S. 467.

(b) The privilege is usually rested on the fiction of extritoriality. See Musurus v. Gadban [1894], 1 Q.B. 533 ; [1894] 2 Q.B. 352. It is not limited to subjects of the nation sending the ambassador. Macartney v. Garbutt, 24 Q.B.D. 368.

recognised does not extend to consuls (c). Apart from this Act it seems to be accepted that diplomatic officers and their suites are, as a matter of amity if not of strict international law, privileged against prosecution for any breach of the criminal law of England (d), and such immunity has been claimed in respect of breaches of the law as to driving motor-cars, public health, and of a claim by coroners to hold inquests on persons dying in an embassy, or on diplomatic officials supposed to have committed suicide. The immunity is the privilege of the sovereign or state which accredits the officer, and might, it would seem, be waived by the sovereign (d).

(d) Provisional arrest in extreme cases may be justified; or the offender may be handed his passports, or a request may be made for his recall for trial in his own country. Hall Int. Law (5th ed.) 172.

BOOK THE THIRD.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE SECURITY OF THE STATE.

PRELIMINARY.

THE offences of treason and treason-felony are not within the scope of this work (a), and attempts to interfere with government by tumultuous petitions and meetings to over-awe Parliament are dealt with under the title 'Riot' (aa).

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF SEDITION.

A. GENERAL DEFINITION OF THE OFFENCE.

SEDITION consists in acts, words, or writings intended or calculated, under the circumstances of the time (b), to disturb the tranquillity of the State, by creating ill-will, discontent, disaffection, hatred, or contempt towards the person of the King, or towards the Constitution or Parliament (bb), or the Government, or the established institutions of the country (c), or by exciting ill-will between different classes of the King's subjects (d), or encouraging any class of them to endeavour to disobey, defy, or subvert the laws (e) or resist their execution, or to create tumults or riots, or to do any act of violence or outrage or endangering the public peace (f).

When the offence is committed by means of writing, or print, or pictures (g), it is termed seditious libel.

The offence is a misdemeanor indictable at common law (h).

(h) R. v. Stroud, 3 St. Tr. 235.

In the case of a seditious libel it is doubtful whether at common law the offence is complete when the libel is composed, or whether it must be shewn that it was also published (i).

Seditious publications are not justified or excused by proof of the truth of the statements made (i).

According to the older authorities it is seditious wantonly to defame or indecorously to calumniate that economy, order, and constitution of things which make up the general system of the law and government of the country (j); and more particularly to degrade or calumniate the person and character of the sovereign (k), or the administration of his government by his officers and ministers of state (l), or the administration of justice by his judges (m), or the proceedings of either House of Parliament (n).

The present view of the law is best stated in R. v. Burns (o). In that case the defendants were charged in one count 'that they at Trafalgar Square with great numbers of other persons assembled and met together, and that they being wicked, malicious, and seditious persons, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously contriving and intending the peace of our said lady the Queen, and of this realm, and of the liege subjects of our said lady the Queen, to disquiet and disturb, and the liege subjects of our said lady the Queen, to incite and to move to contempt, hatred, and dislike of the government established by law within this realm, and to incite and to move and persuade great numbers of the liege subjects of our said lady the Queen, to insurrections, riots, tumults, and breaches of the peace, and to stir up jealousies, hatred, and ill-will between different classes of the said liege subjects, and to prevent by force and arms the execution of the laws of this realm and the preservation of the public peace, on the day and in the year aforesaid, in the presence and hearing of divers of the liege subjects of our lady the Queen, to wit, the persons assembled together as aforesaid in Trafalgar Square as aforesaid and within the jurisdiction of the said Court, in a certain speech and discourse by him the said John Burns, then addressed to the said liege subjects so then assembled together as aforesaid, unlawfully, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously, openly, and publicly did publish, utter, pronounce, and declare, and cause to be published, uttered, pronounced, and declared, with a loud voice of and concerning the government as established by law within this realm, and of and concerning the Commons House of Parliament, and the members thereof, and of and concerning divers liege subjects of our said lady the Queen, whose names are to the jurors aforesaid unknown, amongst other words and matters, the false, wicked, seditious, and inflammatory words and matter following, that is to say: [The words complained of were here set out] against the peace of our lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.'

(o) [1886], 16 Cox, 355. The first-named defendant became in 1906 President of the Local Government Board and a member of the Privy Council.

Another count charged the defendants with a conspiracy to speak seditious words and incite to sedition.

Cave, J., in charging the jury, said : ' It is now my duty to explain to you the rules of law which ought to govern you in considering this case, and also to summarise shortly for your benefit the evidence which has been given, so that you may have the less difficulty in applying the principles of the law to that evidence. There is undoubtedly no question at law of the right of meeting in public, and the right of free discussion is also perfectly unlimited, with the exception, of course, that it must not be used for the purpose of inciting to a breach of the peace or to a violation of the law. The law upon the question of what is seditious and what is not is to be found stated very clearly in a book by Stephen, J., who has undoubtedly a greater knowledge of criminal law than any other judge who sits upon the bench, and what he has said upon the subject of sedition was submitted to the other judges, who some time back were engaged with him in drafting a criminal code, and upon their report the commissioners say that his statement of law appears to them to be stated accurately as it exists at present. So that that statement has not only the authority of Stephen, J., but also the authority of the judges who were associated with him in preparing the criminal code. This is what he says on seditious words and libels : " Every one commits a misdemeanor who publishes verbally or otherwise words or any document with a seditious intention. If the matter so published consists of words spoken, the offence is called the speaking of seditious words." That is what we have to deal with to-day. " If the matter so published is contained in anything capable of being a libel the offence is called the publication of seditious libel " (p). The next question that one asks is this : There are two offences, one is the offence of speaking seditious words, and the other offence is the publication of a seditious libel. It is obviously important to know what is meant by the word " sedition," and Stephen, J., proceeds in a subsequent article to give a definition of it. He says : " A seditious intention is an intention to bring into hatred or contempt, or to excite disaffection against the person of Her Majesty, her heirs, or successors, or the government and constitution of the United Kingdom, as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or the administration of justice, or to excite Her Majesty's subjects to attempt otherwise than by lawful means the alteration of any matter in Church or State as by law established, or to raise discontent or disaffection amongst Her Majesty's subjects or to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of such subjects." Stephen, J., goes on to point out what sort of intention is not seditious. " An intention to shew that Her Majesty has been misled or mistaken in her measures, or to point out errors or defects in the government or constitution as by law established, with a view to their reformation, or to excite Her Majesty's subjects to attempt by lawful means the alteration of any matter in Church or State as by law established, or to point out, in order to their removal, matters which are producing, or have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred and ill-will between classes of Her Majesty's subjects, is not a seditious intention" (q). So there he gives in these two classes what is and what is not sedition. Now, the seditious intentions which it is alleged existed in the minds of the prisoners in this case are : First, an intention to excite Her Majesty's subjects to attempt otherwise than by lawful means the alteration of some matter in Church or State as by law established ; and secondly, to promote feelings of hostility between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects. This is necessarily somewhat vague and general, particularly the second portion, which says it is a seditious intention to intend to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects. I should rather prefer to say, that the intention to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects may be a seditious intention according to circumstances, and of those circumstances, the jury are the judges ; and I put this question to the Attorney-General in the course of the case : " Suppose a man were to write a letter to the papers attacking bakers and butchers generally with reference to the high prices of bread or meat, and imputing to them that they were in a conspiracy to keep up high prices,—would that be a seditious libel, being written and not spoken ? " To which the Attorney-General gave me the only answer which it was clearly possible to give under the circumstances : " That must depend upon the circumstances." I, sitting here as a judge, cannot go nearer than that. Any intention to excite ill-will and hostility between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects may be a seditious intention ; whether in a particular case this is a seditious intention or not, the jury must judge and decide in their own minds, taking into consideration the whole of the circumstances of the case. You may not unnaturally say that that is a somewhat vague statement of the law, and ask by what principle shall we be governed in deciding when an intention to excite ill-will and hostility is seditious, and when it is not. For your guidance, I will read to you what was said by Fitzgerald, J., in the case of R. v. Sullivan (r), which was a prosecution for a seditious libel, the only difference between the two cases being, of course, that while seditious speeches are spoken a seditious libel is written, but in each of them the adjective " seditious " occurs, and what is a seditious intention in one case will equally be a seditious intention in the other. He said : " As such prosecutions are unusual, I think it necessary in the first instance to define sedition and point out what is a seditious libel. Sedition is a crime against society, nearly allied to that of treason, and it frequently precedes treason by a short interval." It has been said very truly that there is no such offence as sedition itself, but it takes the form of seditious language either written or spoken, and it is in that sense of course that the learned judge's words are intended to be understood. " Sedition itself is a comprehensive term, and it embraces all those practices, whether by word, deed, or writing, which are calculated to disturb the tranquillity of the State, and lead ignorant persons to endeavour to subvert the government and the laws of the Empire. The objects of sedition generally are to induce discontent and insurrection, and to stir up opposition to the government, and bring the administration of justice into contempt; and the very tendency of sedition is to incite the people to insurrection and rebellion. Sedition has been described as disloyalty in action, and the law considers as seditious all those practices which have for their object to excite discontent or disaffection, to create public disturbances, or to lead to civil war; to bring into hatred or contempt the sovereign or the government, the laws or constitution of the realm, and generally all endeavours to promote public disorder." Then a little further on he says: "Words may be of a seditious character, but they might arise from sudden heat, be heard only by a few, create no lasting impression, and differ in malignity and permanent effects from writings. Sir Michael Foster said of the latter (s): 'Seditious writings are permanent things, and if published they scatter the poison far and wide. They are acts of deliberation, capable of satisfactory proof, and not ordinarily liable to misconstruction; at least they are submitted to the judgment of the Court naked and undisguised, as they came out of the author's hands.' That points to the nature of the distinction between seditious writings and words, and also points to the difference in the effect which they have, and the extent to which that effect goes, though of course in regard to seditious words, there may be a very great distinction between words uttered to two or three companions in social intercourse, and words uttered to a large multitude." That language the learned judge spoke when he was charging the grand jury upon the subject. When he came to sum up the case to the jury who were actually trying it, after a true bill had been found, he said, and perhaps this is more apposite in shewing the spirit in which you ought to deal with the present case so far as you can: "I invite you to deal with the case, which is a grave and important case, in a fair, free, and liberal spirit. In dealing with the articles you should not pause upon an objectionable sentence here, or a strong word there. It is not mere strong language, such as 'desecrated a court of justice,' or tall language, or turgid language that should influence you. You should, I repeat, deal with the articles in a free, fair, and liberal manner. You should recollect that to public political articles great latitude is given (t). Dealing as they do with the affairs of the day, such articles if written in a fair spirit, and bona fide, often result in the production of great public good. Therefore I advise and recommend you to deal with these publications in a spirit of freedom, and not to view them with an eye of narrow criticism. Again, I say you should not look merely to a strong word or a strong phrase, but to the whole article, and so regarding each article, you should recollect that you are the guardians of the liberty of the press, and that whilst you will check its abuse, you will preserve its freedom. You will recollect how valuable a blessing the liberty of the press is to all of us,

(s) The Editors have been unable to trace this quotation.

(t) See R. v. Burdett, 1 St. Tr. (N. S.) 1, where the jury were told to consider whether a written address to the electors of Warwickshire relating to the Peterloo meeting at Manchester contained a sober address to the reason of mankind as to the conduct of the military in suppressing a riot, or was an appeal to their passions inciting them to violence and outrage. In R. v. Collins (9 C. & P. 456), 3 St. Tr. (N. S.) 1149, Littledale, J., in dealing with a placard containing resolutions of a body known as the General Convention told the jury that the question was whether the resolutions were a calm discussion of the conduct of the police in repressing a riot in the Bull Ring at Birmingham or were meant to incite to the use of physical force.

and sure I am, that that liberty will meet no injury, suffer no diminution at your hands. Viewing the case in a free, bold, manly, and generous spirit toward the defendant, if you come to the conclusion that the publications indicted are not seditious libels, or were not published in the sense imputed to them, you are bound, and I ask you in the name of free discussion, to find a verdict for the defendant. I need not remind you of the worn-out topic to extend to the defendant the benefit of the doubt. If on the other hand, on the whole spirit and import of these articles, you are obliged to come to the conclusions that they are seditious libels, and that their necessary consequences are to excite contempt of Her Majesty's Government, or to bring the administration of the law into contempt and impair its functions,—if you come to that conclusion either as to the articles or prints, or any of them, then it becomes your duty honestly and fearlessly to find a verdict of conviction upon such counts as you believe are proved." Now, that language was used, as I have said, in reference to a seditious libel, but changing the language so as to apply it to a speech, the principles thus laid down are clearly applicable to the case which you have now got before you. And,—although as a judge I can tell you no more than that the intention to incite ill-will amongst the different classes of Her Majesty's subjects may be seditious, and that it is for you to decide,—I confess I should, if I were sitting amongst you as a jurymen, go on to say something of this kind which you would or would not listen to, according as you found it to be quite in reason. It is not a matter of law which you are bound to take from me, but it is merely a matter which you would say to each other; if you think that these defendants, from the whole matter laid before you, had a seditious intention to incite the people to violence, to create public disturbances and disorder, then undoubtedly you ought to find them guilty. If from any sinister motive, as, for instance, notoriety, or for the purpose of personal gain, they desired to bring the people into conflict with the authorities, or to incite them tumultuously and disorderly to damage the property of any unoffending citizen, you ought undoubtedly to find them guilty. On the other hand, if you come to the conclusion that they were actuated by an honest desire to alleviate the misery of the unemployed,—if they had a real bona fide desire to bring that misery before the public by constitutional and legal means, you should not be too swift to mark any hasty or ill-considered expression which they might utter in the excitement of the moment. Some persons are more led on, more open to excitement than others, and one of the defendants, Burns, even when he was defending himself before you, so prone was he to feeling strongly what he does feel, could not refrain from saying that he was unable to see misery and degradation without being moved to strong language and strong action. I mention that to you to shew you the kind of man he is, and for the purpose of seeing (if you come to the conclusion that he was honestly endeavouring to call the attention of the authorities to this misery, and honestly endeavouring to keep within the limits of the law and the constitution) that you should not be too strong to mark if he made use of an ill-considered, or too strong an expression. Now, I come to the particular charge which is made against these men. It divides itself roughly into two heads. There is, first, the charge that they uttered certain words upon the occasion of this demonstration, and that is separated into nine counts, and then there comes a general charge which involves the whole of them, namely, that they agreed together before they went to this meeting that they would make speeches with the intention of exciting the people to disorder. I am unable to agree entirely with the Attorney-General when he says that the real charge is that, though these men did not incite or contemplate disorder, yet as it was the natural consequence of the words they used, they are responsible for it. In order to make out the offence of speaking seditious words, there must be a criminal intent upon the part of the accused, they must be words spoken with a seditious intent, and although it is a good working rule, to say that a man must be taken to intend the natural consequence of his acts, and it is very proper to ask a jury to infer, if there is nothing to shew the contrary, that he did intend the natural consequences of his acts, yet, if it is shewn from other circumstances, that he did not actually intend them, I do not see how you can ask a jury to act upon what has then become a legal fiction. I am glad to say that with regard to this matter, I have the authority again of Stephen, J., who, in his "History of the Criminal Law," has dealt with this very point; he deals with it in reference to the question of seditious libel. He says (u): "To make the criminality of an act dependent upon the intention with which it is done, is advisable in those cases only in which the intent essential to the crime is capable of being clearly defined and readily inferred from the facts. Wounding, with intent to do grievous bodily harm, breaking into a house with intent to commit a felony, abduction with intent to marry or defile, are instances of such offences. Even in these cases, however, the introduction of the term 'intent' occasionally led either to a failure of justice or to the employment of something approaching to a legal fiction in order to avoid it. The maxim that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts is usually true, but it may be used as a way of saying that, because reckless indifference to probable consequences is morally as bad as an intention to produce those consequences, the two things ought to be called by the same name, and this is at least an approach to a legal fiction. It is one thing to write with a distinct intention to produce disturbances, and another to write violently and recklessly matter likely to produce disturbances" (uu). Now, if you apply that last sentence to the speaking of words, of course it is precisely applicable to the case now before you. It is one thing to speak with the distinct intention to produce disturbances, and another thing to speak recklessly and violently of what is likely to produce disturbances. I must, however, notwithstanding what I have said upon that subject, go on to tell you that it is not at all necessary to the offence of uttering seditious words that an actual riot should follow, that there should be an actual disturbance of the public peace; it is the uttering with the intent which is the (u) Vol. ii. p. 359.

(uu) See R. v. Cobbett [1831], 2 St. Tr. (N. S.) 789, where Tenterden, C.J., ruled that the question for the jury was whether the natural tendency of an article in the offence, not the consequences which follow, and which have really nothing to do with the offence. A man cannot escape from the consequences of uttering words with the intent to excite people to violence solely because the persons to whom they are addressed may be too wise or too temperate to be seduced into that violence. That has, however, no important bearing in this case. If you come to the conclusion that language was used by the defendants or any of them upon the occasion of that meeting in Trafalgar Square, and that it was their intention to excite the people to violence, to a breach of the law, why then that would undoubtedly be the uttering of seditious words. And I apprehend that the Attorney-General was anxious to fortify himself with this, that the actual disturbances were the natural consequence of what was said, and for perhaps more than one reason. In the first place the Government undoubtedly declined to prosecute on the assumption that the defendants had actually incited to the particular disturbances, and although that as I have said is not at all necessary or essential to the procuring of a conviction, yet undoubtedly that is the moral justification, so to say, the grounds upon which the Government do place the action which they take, and therefore if they can shew, or if you are satisfied that these disturbances, although not contemplated by the defendants, were the natural consequence of their acts, although that has nothing at all to do with the charge which we are engaged in investigating, yet it does affect in some way the position which the Government desire to take up. There is another point, however, which does affect the question which you have to try, and it is this, as to the language used by the defendant, Was it used with the intention to produce violence? As something no doubt may be gathered from the effect which was actually produced, there does come a point when one must say, "This was so violent and reckless that it is impossible to conceive that the man who uttered this did not intend the consequence which must ensue from it." Again, there is another passage of Stephen, J.'s, book, where he says (v): "If a meeting is held for the purpose of speaking seditious words to those who may attend it, those who take part in that design are guilty of a seditious conspiracy." Now in order to have a conspiracy you must have an agreement formed beforehand between the parties in that conspiracy, that they will hold or have a meeting, and that the words there spoken shall be words of sedition. As I have said, I do not see any evidence that at all points to any such conspiracy, and I certainly should recommend you strongly not to pay any further attention to that part of the case. But the Attorney-General says, and very properly, although there may have been no previous conspiracy, yet when people do go to a meeting there are circumstances under which a man may be responsible not only for what he says, but also for what some one else says. Now what are those circumstances? Stephen, J., says: "If at a meeting lawfully convened seditious words are spoken, of such a nature as are likely to produce a breach of the peace, that meeting may become unlawful, and all those who speak the words undoubtedly are guilty of uttering seditious words, and those who do anything to help those who speak to produce upon the hearers the natural effect of the words spoken." You must do something more than stand by and say nothing ; if you express approval of the statements of speakers who utter seditious language that equally will do ; if you make a speech calculated to help that part of the speech made by some one else, and which excited to disorder ; if you do anything to help that part of the effect upon the hearers, then undoubtedly you will be guilty of uttering seditious words just as if you spoke them yourself. But there must be something of that kind. If one man uses seditious words at a meeting, those who stand by and do nothing, although they do not reprobate them, are not guilty of uttering seditious words. Those even who make a speech themselves are not guilty of uttering seditious words unless you can gather from the language they use that they are endeavouring to assist the other man in carrying out that portion of his speech, and by that course endeavouring to assist him in causing his words, which excite to disorder, to produce their natural effect upon the people.' [The learned judge then reviewed the evidence given on the part of the prosecution and the defence, and pointed out that there was considerable difficulty in separating and apportioning the different elements which contributed to the riots, that public meetings and public discussions always attracted together numbers of rough persons, members of criminal classes, and other persons not dishonest, but noisy and disorderly, and who would take advantage of the absence of the police to break windows and street lamps, and do other mischief of that kind, and that it was impossible to say that any disorder that arose was necessarily due to speeches made by persons who were themselves orderly, because of the presence of the disorderly elements of the crowd who had collected together, and, in conclusion, said:] 'I must now leave you to apply the principles of law I have laid down to the facts which have been laid before you. I have to remind you of what you are asked to say. What you are asked to decide on is whether the prisoners—all of them, or some of them, and if some of them, which of them—did upon this occasion, in Trafalgar Square, incite the people whom they were addressing to redress their grievance by violence. Did they intentionally incite ill-will between different classes in such a way as to be likely to lead to a disturbance of the public peace ? I have already told you that you must take a broad and even a generous view of the whole of the case presented to you. You must not attach too much importance to isolated phrases, but you must look at the general gist of the matter. You must consider the object which took them there, the way they set about attaining it, and you must also consider to some extent, as throwing some light upon your decision, whether the riots which actually took place were the natural consequences of speeches delivered on that occasion. I cannot conclude without expressing my sense of the extreme folly of those who seek to incite the people to violence. And for this reason : There has been no period of history where violence was so practically useless. The Government being in the hands of the people, none can hope to carry out by force views which he might be able to effect by prudence and consistency, and by legal and legitimate means. And therefore, to incite people to use force is to expose foolish men, and men who do not see the danger they run, to a conflict with the authorities, with the certainty that they will have to pay with grievous loss of life' (w).

Weekly Register was to manifest the design alleged in the indictment, viz. to create discontent and incite to violence with reference to firing stacks and breaking threshing machines.

Trial and Punishment.—Sedition is not triable at quarter sessions (x). Seditious libel may be tried in the county in which it was composed, if composed for publication, or in the county where it is published (y). At common law the punishment of sedition is by fine, or imprisonment without hard labour, or both (z), with or without recognisances, with sureties for good behaviour (a). There is no statutory limit to the term of imprisonment or the amount of the fine. Persons sentenced to imprisonment for sedition or seditious libel are to be treated as offenders of the first division (b). By the Criminal Libel Act, 1820 (c) (60 Geo. III. & 1 Geo. IV. c. 8), provisions are made as to seditious libels 'tending to bring into hatred or contempt the person or government of His Majesty, or the government or constitution of the United Kingdom as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt the alteration of any matter in Church or State as by law established otherwise than by lawful means' (sect. 1). 'Any person legally convicted of having composed, printed, or published any such seditious libel, as aforesaid, and shall, after being so convicted, offend a second time, and be thereof legally convicted before any Commission of Oyer and Terminer or Gaol Delivery, or in the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, may, on such second conviction, be adjudged at the discretion of the Court to suffer such punishment as may now (December 30, 1820) by law be inflicted in cases of high misdemeanors' . . . (sect. 4) (d). Power is given in case of verdict or judgment by default for the Court in which the verdict is taken or in which the judgment is had, to order search for and seizure of all copies of the libel in the possession of the defendant, or of any other person sworn to have copies in his possession for the use of the defendant. The order for search may be executed by a justice or constable (sect. 2). Copies seized under the order are disposed of after final judgment as the Court may order, but returned if judgment is arrested or on error revised (sect. 3).

No form of sedition can be justified at common law or under the Libel Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), s. 6, by proof of the truth of the matters published (e), the gist of the offence being in the intent to do one or other of the matters stated in the definition (f).

It seems to be unnecessary to use the words 'seditious' or 'seditiously' in the indictment if the offence charged is by other words specifically indicated (g). Seditious libel seems to be within sect. 7 of the Libel Act,

B. Publications against the King.

Common Law.—Bare words, not relative to any act or design, however wicked, indecent, or reprehensible they may be, are not in themselves overt acts of high treason (m), though words may expound an overt act, and shew with what intent it was done (n). Generally speaking, any words, acts, or writing in respect of the public acts or private conduct (o) of the King which tend to vilify or disgrace the King, or to lessen him in the esteem of his subjects, or any denial of his right to the crown, even in common and unadvised discourse, may be punished as sedition (p).

Statute.—By the Succession to the Crown Act, 1707 (q), it is declared treason to write or print against the Succession of the Crown as established by the Acts of Settlement (r) and of Union with Scotland (s).

In R. v. Lambert (t), the defendant was charged with having published a libel to the following effect: 'What a crowd of blessings rush upon one's mind, that might be bestowed upon the country in the event of a total change of system! Of all monarchs, indeed, since the Revolution, the successor of George the Third will have the finest opportunity of becoming nobly popular.' Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in summing up the case to the jury, said, that the first sentence of this passage would easily admit of an innocent interpretation; that the fair meaning of the expression 'change of system' was a change of political system,—not a change in the frame of the established government, but in the measures of policy which had been for some time pursued; and that by total change of system was certainly not meant subversion or demolition, the descent of the crown to the successor of His Majesty being mentioned immediately after. He proceeded: 'If a person who admits the wisdom and virtues of His Majesty, laments that in the exercise of these he has taken an unfortunate and erroneous view of the interests of his dominions, I am not prepared to say that this tends to degrade His Majesty, or to alienate the affections of his subjects. I am not prepared to say that this is libellous. But it must be with perfect decency and respect, and without any imputation of bad motives. Go one step further, and say or insinuate that His Majesty acts from any partial or corrupt view or with an intention to favour or oppress any individual or class of men, and it would become most libellous.' Upon the second sentence, after stating that it was more equivocal, and telling the jury that they must determine what was the fair import of the words employed, not in the more lenient or severe sense, but in the sense fairly belonging to them, and which they were intended to convey, Lord Ellenborough proceeded: 'Now do these words mean, that His Majesty is actuated by improper motives, or that his successor may render himself nobly popular by taking a more lively interest in the welfare of his subjects? Such sentiments, as it would be most mischievous, so it would be most criminal to propagate. But if the passage only means that His Majesty, during his reign, or any length of time, may have taken an imperfect view of the interests of the country, either respecting our foreign relations, or the system of our internal policy; if it imputes nothing but honest error, without moral blame, I am not prepared to say that it is a libel.' And again, towards the conclusion of his address, his Lordship said: 'The question of intention is for your consideration. You will not distort the words, but give them their application and meaning as they impress your minds. What appears to me most material is the substantive paragraph itself (u); and if you consider it as meant to represent that the reign of His Majesty is the only thing interposed between the subjects of this country and the possession of great blessings which are likely to be enjoyed in the reign of his successor, and thus to render His Majesty's administration of his government odious, it is a calumnious paragraph, and to be dealt with as a libel. If on the contrary you do not see that it means distinctly, according to your reasoning, to impute any purposed maladministration to His Majesty, or those acting under him, but may be fairly construed as an expression of regret that an erroneous view has been taken of public affairs, I am not prepared to say that it is a libel. There have been errors in the administration of the most enlightened men.'

Falsely publishing that King George III. was labouring under mental derangement was held to be an offence on the ground that it tended to unsettle and agitate the public mind, and to lower the respect due to the King (v).

As to libel by defaming a deceased sovereign, see R. v. Hunt (w).

(u) This libel was published in a newspaper; and it had been allowed to the defendant to have read in evidence an extract from the same paper connected with the subject of the passage claimed as libellous, although disjoined from it by extraneous matter, and printed in a different character.

C. Publications against the Constitution.

By an Act of 1662 (13 Car. II. st. 1, c. 1), s. 3, the penalties of praemunire are incurred by persons who maliciously and advisedly, by writing, printing, preaching, or express words, declare that Parliament has legislative authority without the King. And by an Act of 1707 (6 Anne, c. 41), s. 2, a like penalty is incurred by persons who maliciously or advisedly by preaching, teaching, or express words, maintain or affirm that any person has title to the crown otherwise than in accordance with the Act of Settlement. Prosecutions under these Acts are narrowly limited (x), and are, in fact, never undertaken.

Apart from these Acts, under the law of sedition as now interpreted there is perfect liberty to deride the constitution or to advocate its alteration, provided that the advocacy is not calculated or intended to produce civil commotion or insurrection (y).

The following rulings are here retained as giving a view of the law once held, but now unlikely to be adopted (z). It appears to have been adjudged, that though no indictment lay for saying that the laws of the realm were not the laws of God, because true it is that they are not the laws of God; yet that it would be otherwise to say that the laws of the realm are contrary to the laws of God (z). And a defendant was convicted on an information charging him with having published, concerning the government of England and the traitors who adjudged King Charles the First to death, that the government of the kingdom consists of three estates, and that if a rebellion should happen in the kingdom, unless that rebellion was against the three estates, it was no rebellion (a). In another case a person was convicted for publishing a libel, in which it was suggested that the revolution was an unjust and unconstitutional proceeding, and that the limitation established by the Act of Settlement was illegal, and that the revolution and settlement of the crown as by law established had been attended with fatal and pernicious consequences to the subjects of the kingdom (b).

D. Publications against Parliament.

Both Houses of Parliament have and exercise the power of treating libels against them as breaches of their privileges, and vindicating them in the nature of contempts: and more cases of such libels are to be met with in their journals than in the proceedings of the Courts of law (c).

upon hereditary right was held criminal, though it contained no reflection upon any part of the then government. R. v. Bedford [1713], Gilb. 297; 2 Str. 789 cit.

(c) They are collected in May, Parl. Pr. (11th ed.), pp. 76 et seq. The extent to which these powers are possessed by colonial legislatures is considered in Odgers on Libel (4th ed.), 492.

But publications reflecting upon the members or proceedings of the Houses of Parliament are also punishable by the ordinary Courts (d). In R. v. Stockdale (e), the Attorney-General in his speech to the jury, after stating the address of the House of Commons to the King, praying that His Majesty would direct the information to be filed, proceeded thus: 'I state it as a measure which they have taken, thinking it in their wisdom, as every one must think it, to be the fittest to bring before a jury of their country an offender against themselves, avoiding thereby, what sometimes indeed is unavoidable, but which they wish to avoid whenever it can be done with propriety, the acting both as judges and accusers, which they must necessarily have done, had they resorted to their own powers, which are great and extensive, for the purposes of vindicating themselves against insult and contempt, but which in the present instance they have wisely forborne to exercise, thinking it better to leave the offender to be dealt with by a fair and impartial jury.'

E. Publications against the Government.

The measures of the King and his advisers, and the proceedings and policy of his government, may be criticised within due limits without incurring the penalties of sedition. Every man has a right to give every public matter a candid, full, and free discussion; but although the people have a right to discuss any grievances they have to complain of, they must not do it in a way to excite tumult; and if a party publish a paper on any such matter, and it contain no more than a calm and quiet discussion, allowing something for a little feeling in men's minds, that will be no libel; but if the paper go beyond that limit, and be calculated to excite tumult, it is a libel (f). This right extends to the press (g).

But the discussion of political measures cannot lawfully be made a cloak for an attack upon private character. Libels on persons employed in a public capacity may tend to scandalise the government by reflecting on those who are entrusted with the administration of public affairs; for they not only endanger the public peace, as all other libels do, by stirring up the parties immediately concerned to acts of revenge, but also have a direct tendency to incline the people to faction and sedition (h). And if a publication has a direct tendency to cause unlawful meetings and disturbances, and to lead to a violation of the laws, it is a seditious libel (i).

(d) In R. v. Rayner, 2 Barnard. (K.B.), 293, the defendant was convicted of printing a scandalous libel on the Lords and Commons. And see R. v. Owen [1752], 18 St. Tr. 1203; MS. Dig. L. L. 67. In R. v. Stockdale [1788], 22 St. Tr. 238, an information was filed by the Attorney-General for a libel upon the House of Commons. A prosecution was also instituted in R. v. Reeves [1796], in consequence of a resolution of the House of Commons, declaring a pamphlet, published by the defendant, to be a libel. In the pamphlet, which was called 'Thoughts on the English Government,' there was this passage amongst others which the House deemed libellous—'That the King's government might go on if the Lords and Commons were lopped off.' In all these cases the jury acquitted the defendants.

(i) R. v. Lovett, 9 C. & P. 462, Littledale, J.

According to certain rulings, it is seditious to publish any matter tending to possess the people with an ill opinion of the government. In R. v. Tuchin (j), Holt, C.J., said: 'This is a very strange doctrine to say that it is not a libel reflecting on the government, endeavouring to possess the people that the government is maladministered by corrupt persons that are employed in such stations, either in the navy or army. To say that corrupt officers are appointed to administer affairs is certainly a reflection on the government. If men should not be called to account for possessing the people with an ill opinion of the government, no government can subsist; nothing can be worse to any government than to endeavour to procure animosities as to the management of it; this has always been looked upon as a crime, and no government can be safe unless it be punished' (j).

This decision, if taken literally, is inconsistent with liberty of political opinion (k). And in R. v. Cobbett (l), where the defendant was charged with publishing a libel upon the administration of the Irish government, and upon the public conduct and character of the Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Ellenborough, C.J., in his address to the jury, said: 'It is no new doctrine that if a publication be calculated to alienate the affections of the people, by bringing the government into disesteem, whether the expedient be by ridicule or obloquy, the person so conducting himself is exposed to the inflictions of the law. It is a crime; it has ever been considered as a crime, whether wrapt in one form or another. The case of R. v. Tuchin, decided in the time of Lord Chief Justice Holt, has removed all ambiguity from this question; and, although at the period when that case was decided great political contentions existed, the matter was not again brought before the judges of the Court by any application for a new trial.' And afterwards his Lordship said: 'It has been observed, that it is the right of the British subject to exhibit the folly or imbecility of the members of the government. But, gentlemen, we must confine ourselves within limits. If in so doing individual feelings are violated, there the line of interdiction begins, and the offence becomes the subject of penal visitation.'

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF WRONGFULLY OBTAINING OR DISCLOSING PUBLIC SECRETS.

THE Official Secrets Act, 1889 (a) (52 & 53 Vict. c. 52), deals with two classes of offence: (1) what is called espionnage, in obtaining secret information; (2) breach of official trust by persons in the service of the State.

The Act provides as follows:—

Sect. 1.—(1) (a.) Where a person for the purpose of wrongfully obtaining information—

- (i.) enters or is in any part of a place belonging to His Majesty the King, being a fortress, arsenal, factory, dockyard, camp, ship, office, or other like place, in which part he is not entitled to be; or
- (ii.) when lawfully or unlawfully in any such place as aforesaid, either obtains any document, sketch, plan, model, or knowledge of anything which he is not entitled to obtain, or takes without lawful authority any sketch or plan; or
- (iii.) when outside any fortress, arsenal, factory, dockyard, or camp belonging to His Majesty the King, takes or attempts to take without authority given by or on behalf of His Majesty, any sketch or plan of that fortress, arsenal, factory, dockyard, or camp; or
- (b.) where a person knowingly having possession of, or control over any such document, sketch, plan, model, or knowledge as has been obtained or taken by means of any act which constitutes an offence against this Act at any time wilfully and without lawful authority communicates or attempts to communicate the same to any person to whom the same ought not, in the interest of the State, to be communicated at that time; or
- (c.) where a person after having been entrusted in confidence by some officer under His Majesty the King with any document, sketch, plan, model, or information relating to any such place as aforesaid, or to the naval or military affairs of His Majesty, wilfully and in breach of such confidence communicates the same when, in the interest of the State, it ought not to be communicated; he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction be liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding one year, or to a fine, or to both imprisonment and a fine.

‘(2) Where a person having possession of any document, sketch, plan, model, or information relating to any fortress, arsenal, factory, dockyard, camp, ship, office, or other like place belonging to His Majesty, or to any naval or military affairs of His Majesty, in whatever manner the same has been obtained or taken, at any time wilfully communicates the same to any person to whom he knows the same ought not, in the interest of the State, to be communicated at that time, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to the same punishment as if he committed an offence under the foregoing provisions of this section.

‘(3) Where a person commits any act declared by this section to be a misdemeanor, he shall, if he intended to communicate to a foreign State any information, document, sketch, plan, model, or knowledge obtained or taken by him, or entrusted to him as aforesaid, or if he communicates the same to any agent of a foreign State, be guilty of felony, and on conviction be liable at the discretion of the Court to penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than five years (b), or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.’

Breach of Official Trust.—By sect. 2, ‘(1) Where a person by means of his holding or having held an office under His Majesty the King, has lawfully or unlawfully either obtained possession of or control over any document, sketch, plan, or model, or acquired any information, and at any time corruptly or contrary to his official duty communicates or attempts to communicate that document, sketch, plan, model, or information to any person to whom the same ought not, in the interests of the State, otherwise in the public interest, to be communicated at that time, he shall be guilty of a breach of official trust.

‘(2) A person guilty of a breach of official trust shall—

(a.) if the communication was made or attempted to be made to a foreign State, be guilty of felony, and on conviction be liable at the discretion of the Court to penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than five years (b), or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; and

(b.) in any other case be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction be liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding one year, or to a fine, or to both imprisonment and a fine.

‘(3) This section shall apply to a person holding a contract with any department of the government of the United Kingdom, or with the holder of any office under His Majesty the King as such holder, where such contract involves an obligation of secrecy, and to any person employed by any person or body of persons holding such a contract, who is under a like obligation of secrecy, as if the person holding the contract and the person so employed were respectively holders of an office under His Majesty the King.’

By sect. 4, 'The expenses of the prosecution of a misdemeanor under this Act shall be defrayed in like manner as in the case of a felony' (c).

By sect. 5, 'If by any law made before or after the passing of this Act by the legislature of any British possession provisions are made which appear to His Majesty the King to be of the like effect as those contained in this Act, His Majesty may, by Order in Council, suspend the operation within such British possession of this Act, or of any part thereof, so long as such law continues in force there, and no longer, and such order shall have effect as if it were enacted in this Act :

Provided that the suspension of this Act, or of any part thereof, in any British possession shall not extend to the holder of an office under His Majesty the King who is not appointed to that office by the Government of that possession.

'The expression "British possession" means any part of His Majesty's dominions not within the United Kingdom' (d).

By sect. 6, '(1) This Act shall apply to all acts made offences by this Act when committed in any part of His Majesty's dominions or when committed by British officers or subjects elsewhere.

'(2) An offence under this Act, if alleged to have been committed out of the United Kingdom, may be inquired of, heard, and determined, in any competent British Court in the place where the offence was committed, or in His Majesty's High Court of Justice in England or the Central Criminal Court, and the Criminal Jurisdiction Act, 1802 (42 Geo. III. c. 85) (e), shall apply in like manner as if the offence were mentioned in that Act, and the Central Criminal Court as well as the High Court possessed the jurisdiction given by that Act to the Court of King's Bench.

'(3) An offence under this Act shall not be tried by any Court of general or quarter sessions, nor by the Sheriff Court in Scotland, nor by any Court out of the United Kingdom which has not jurisdiction to try crimes which involve the greatest punishment allowed by law' (f).

By sect. 7, '(1) A prosecution for an offence against this Act shall not be instituted except by or with the consent of the Attorney-General.

'(2) In this section the expression "Attorney-General" means the Attorney or Solicitor General for England; and as respects Scotland, means the Lord Advocate; and as respects Ireland, means the Attorney or Solicitor General for Ireland; and if the prosecution is instituted in any Court out of the United Kingdom, means the person who in that Court is Attorney-General, or exercises the like functions as the Attorney-General in England.'

By sect. 9, 'This Act shall not exempt any person from any proceeding for an offence which is punishable at common law, or by military or naval law, or under any Act of Parliament other than this Act, so, however, that no person be punished twice for the same offence' (g).

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF SEDUCING SOLDIERS AND SAILORS TO MUTINY.

THE Incitement to Mutiny Act, 1797 (37 Geo. III. c. 70), was passed in consequence of the attempts of evil-disposed persons, by the publication of written or printed papers, and by malicious and advised speaking, to seduce soldiers and sailors from their duty and allegiance to the Crown. It enacts (sect. 1) that 'any person who shall maliciously and advisedly endeavour to seduce any person or persons serving in His Majesty's forces by sea or land, from his or their duty and allegiance to His Majesty, or to incite or stir up any such person or persons to commit any act of mutiny, or to make or endeavour to make any mutinous assembly, or to commit any traitorous or mutinous practice whatsoever, shall, on being legally convicted of such offence, be adjudged guilty of felony . . . ' (a). By sect. 3, 'any person who shall be tried and acquitted or convicted of any offence against this Act shall not be liable to be indicted, prosecuted or tried again for the same offence or fact as high treason or misprision of high treason; and that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to extend to prevent any persons guilty of any offence against the Act, and who shall not be tried for the same as an offence against this Act from being tried for the same as high treason, or misprision of high treason, in such manner as if this Act had not been made' (b). By sect. 2, 'any offence committed against this Act, whether committed on the high seas or within that part of Great Britain called England, shall, and may, be prosecuted and tried before any Court of Oyer and Terminer, or Gaol Delivery, for any county in that part of Great Britain called England (c), in such manner and form as if the said offence had been therein committed' (d).

The Punishment of Offences Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 91), s. 1, after reciting the above Act, provides that 'if any person shall' (after the 1st of October, 1837) 'be convicted of any of the offences herein-before mentioned, such person shall not suffer death, or have sentence of death awarded against him or her for the same, but shall be liable . . . to be transported (e) beyond the seas for the term of the natural life of such person. . . . Mutiny appears to mean 'collective insubordination' (f).

Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212). Other provisions of 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 91, as to minimum term of transportation, and as to imprisonment, hard labour and solitary confinement, are superseded and repealed.

(f) See Manual of Military Law (ed. 1903), p. 20.

who therefore was not entitled to pay, nor liable for what he then did to answer before a court-martial, is nevertheless a person serving in His Majesty's forces by sea within this statute, so as to make the seducing him an offence within its provisions (g).

An indictment upon this statute need not set out the means used for seducing the soldier from his duty and allegiance; and it need not aver that the prisoner knew the person endeavoured to be seduced to be a soldier. It seems also that a double act, namely, that the prisoner endeavoured to incite a soldier to commit mutiny, and also to commit traitorous and mutinous practices, may be charged in one count of the indictment (h).

The Act of 1797 mainly concerns civilians. Mutiny, &c., by persons in the army or navy is punished under other Acts.

By the Naval Discipline Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109), it is made a capital offence (i.) for persons subject to the Act to join in mutiny with violence, or treacherously to fail to do his best to suppress such mutiny (sect. 10) or to be ringleader in mutiny (sect. 11) without violence; (ii.) for any person on board a King's ship whether otherwise subject to the Act or not, to endeavour to seduce from his allegiance to His Majesty any person subject to the Act (sects. 12–13); (iii.) for any person, subject to the Act, to endeavour to incite any other person, subject to the Act, to commit any act of mutiny (sect. 12).

The punishment of penal servitude may be awarded—

- (1) For failing from cowardice to use utmost effects to suppress mutiny with violence (sect. 10).
- (2) To join in any mutiny without violence, or to fail to do their utmost to support it (sect. 11).
- (3) To make, or endeavour to make, a mutinous assembly (sect. 14).
- (4) Wilfully to conceal any traitorous or mutinous practice (sect. 15).

By sect. 7 of the Army Act (i), persons subject to military law (j), who cause, or conspire to cause, mutiny in any forces belonging to the regular, reserve, or auxiliary forces, or navy, are liable on conviction by court-martial to suffer death (k).

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

OF AIDING THE ESCAPE OF PRISONERS OF WAR (a).

THE Prisoners of War Escape Act, 1812 (52 Geo. III. c. 156), enacts, sect. 1, that 'every person who shall (after 29 July, 1812) knowingly and wilfully aid or assist any alien enemy of His Majesty, being a prisoner of war in His Majesty's dominions, whether such prisoner shall be confined as a prisoner of war in any prison or other place of confinement, or shall be suffered to be at large in His Majesty's dominions or any part thereof on his parole, to escape from such prison or other place of confinement, or from His Majesty's dominions, if at large upon parole, shall upon being convicted thereof be adjudged guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported as a felon for life, or for such term of fourteen or seven years as the Court before whom such person shall be convicted shall adjudge' (b).

Sect. 2. 'Provided always that . . . every person who shall knowingly and wilfully aid or assist any such prisoner at large on parole in quitting any part of His Majesty's dominions where he may be on his parole, although he shall not aid or assist such person in quitting the coast of any part of His Majesty's dominions, shall be deemed guilty of aiding the escape of such person under the provisions of this Act.'

Sect. 3. 'If any person or persons owing allegiance to His Majesty, after any such prisoner as aforesaid hath quitted the coast of any part of His Majesty's dominions in such his escape as aforesaid, shall knowingly and wilfully upon the high seas aid or assist such prisoner in his escape to or towards any other dominions or place, such person shall also be adjudged guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported as aforesaid ; ' and such offences committed upon the high seas, and not within the body of any county, may be tried in any county within the realm (c). Before this Act, upon an indictment for misdemeanor in unlawfully aiding and assisting a prisoner at war to escape, where it appeared that such prisoner was acting in concert with those under whose charge he was placed, in order to effect the detection of the defendant, who was supposed to have been instrumental in the escapes of other prisoners, and the prisoner in question neither escaped nor intended to escape : it was held that the offence was not complete, and that a conviction for such offence was therefore wrong (d).

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

OF UNLAWFUL OATHS, COMBINATIONS, AND CONFEDERACIES.

SECT. I.—OF VOLUNTARY OATHS.

THIS section would perhaps be more properly associated with official misconduct, but is here included as being of use for comparison with the subsequent sections relating to 'unlawful oaths.'

Voluntary Oaths.—Coke says (3 Inst. 165): 'oaths that have no warrant by law are rather nova tormenta quam sacramenta: and it is a high contempt to minister an oath without warrant of law, to be punished by fine and imprisonment.' In Bramat v. Fire Insurance Co. (a), Kenyon, C.J., said: 'he did not know but that a magistrate subjects himself to a criminal information by taking a voluntary extra-judicial affidavit.' In R. v. Eadon (b), in speaking of the Unlawful Oaths Act, 1797, Le Blanc, J., said: 'That which always was before a crime or misdemeanor, the administering even an idle oath by a person not having authority to administer an oath, was by that Act made more penal.'

The Statutory Declarations Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. IV c. 62), s. 13, after reciting that 'a practice has prevailed of administering and receiving oaths and affidavits voluntarily taken and made in matters not the subject of any judicial inquiry, nor in anywise pending or at issue before the justice of the peace, or other person by whom such oaths or affidavits have been administered or received,' and that 'doubts have arisen whether or not such proceeding is illegal, for the more effectual suppression of such practice and removing such doubts,' enacts, 'that from and after the commencement of this Act, it shall not be lawful for any justice of the peace or other person to administer, or cause or allow to be administered, or to receive or cause or allow to be received, any oath, affidavit, or solemn affirmation touching any matter or thing whereof such justice or other person hath not jurisdiction or cognizance by some statute in force at the time being: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to any oath, affidavit, or solemn affirmation before any justice in any matter or thing touching the preservation of the peace, or the prosecution, trial, or punishment of offences, or touching any proceedings before either of the Houses of Parliament, or any committee thereof respectively, nor to any oath, affidavit, or affirmation which may be required by the laws of any foreign country to give validity to instruments in writing designed to be used in such foreign countries respectively' (c).

The first count of an indictment upon the above enactment charged that the defendant, being a justice of the peace, did unlawfully administer to and receive from J. H. a certain voluntary oath touching certain matters and things whereof the defendant had not jurisdiction or cognisance by any statute. The second and third counts slightly varied, and the fourth count negatived the proviso in sect. 13. There were other counts charging the defendant with administering oaths to two other persons. The defendant had made a complaint to the bishop against two clergymen. The defendant obtained statements from the three persons mentioned in the indictment, and swore them before himself, as a justice of the peace, to the truth of the statements. It appeared that the defendant was ignorant of the statute rendering the administering voluntary oaths illegal. It was contended that the enacting part of the statute must be construed with reference to the preamble. Coleridge, J., in summing up, said, he was of opinion that the enacting part of the statute was not governed by the preamble; that he considered the enacting part of the section and the proviso preserved to justices of the peace all the jurisdiction they had, as well as the common law as by statute, to administer oaths; and that the inquiry before the bishop was clearly a matter in respect of which the defendant had no jurisdiction, either at common law or by statute. He directed the jury, that, if they were satisfied the defendant did administer the oaths, they should find him guilty. The jury found the defendant 'guilty of inadvertently administering an oath or oaths'; and Coleridge, J., held that that was a verdict of guilty (d). But the judgment was afterwards arrested by the Court of Queen's Bench upon the ground that the indictment was bad since it did not in any count shew what the nature of the oath was. There ought to have been a distinct allegation of the subject-matter of the oath, shewing affirmatively that it was out of the jurisdiction of the magistrate. The question was matter of law for the Court, and though, in the opinion of the majority of the Court, it was not necessary to set out the whole of the oath (e), still the facts should have been so stated as to enable the Court to form its opinion upon the question whether the oath was within the jurisdiction of the magistrate or not.

The indictment in this case could be justified as being for a wilful

(d) R. v. Nott, 4 Q.B. 768. It was argued that the defendant on the finding of the jury had been guilty of no offence. Denman, C.J., said: 'If the statute in terms create an offence, all persons are bound to know it. But if a statute enacts something, without in terms making it an offence, and you would convict a person of misdemeanor in having disobeyed such an enactment, are you not bound to shew that the disobedience was wilful, and in the nature of a contempt?' But no opinion was pronounced on this point.

(e) The Acts of 1797 and 1812 contain express provisions on this point (see post, p. 330). It would therefore be prudent to set out the whole oath, if practicable, in some counts.

disobedience of the command of a statute as a matter of public concern (f).

SECT. II.—OATHS TO COMMIT TREASON, FELONY, &c.

The Unlawful Oaths Act, 1797 (37 Geo. III. c. 123), recites that ‘wicked and evil disposed persons have of late attempted to seduce persons serving in His Majesty’s forces by sea and land and others of His Majesty’s subjects from their duty and allegiance to His Majesty, and to incite them to acts of mutiny (g) and sedition, and have endeavoured to give effect to their wicked and traitorous proceedings by imposing upon the persons whom they have attempted to seduce the pretended obligation of oaths unlawfully administered’ (h). From this preamble it appears as if the statute were mainly directed against combinations for purposes of mutiny (h) and sedition : but in the enacting part, after dealing with offences of that description, it goes on in much more extensive terms, and embraces other more general objects. Sect. 1 enacts, ‘that any person or persons who shall in any manner or form whatsoever administer or cause to be administered, or be aiding or assisting at, or present at and consenting to, the administering or taking of any oath or engagement, purporting or intended to bind the person taking the same to engage in any mutinous or seditious purpose ; or to disturb the public peace, or to be of any association, society or confederacy formed for any such purpose, or to obey the orders or commands of any committee or body of men not lawfully constituted, or of any leader or commander or other person not having authority by law for that purpose, or not to inform or give evidence against any associate, confederate or other person, or not to reveal or discover any unlawful combination or confederacy, or not to reveal or discover any illegal act done or to be done, or not to reveal or discover any illegal oath or engagement which may have been administered or tendered to or taken by such person or persons or to or by any other person or persons, or the import of any such oath or engagement, shall on conviction thereof by due course of law be adjudged guilty of felony, and may be transported for any term of years not exceeding seven (i) years ; and every person who shall take any such oath or engagement, not being compelled thereto, shall on conviction thereof by due course of law be adjudged guilty of felony, and may be transported for any term of years not exceeding seven (i) years.’

The question was raised whether this Act applied to the unlawful administering of an oath by an associated body of men to a person, purporting to bind him not to reveal or discover an unlawful combination or conspiracy of persons, nor any illegal act done by them (j), the object of the association being a conspiracy to raise wages and make regulations in a certain trade, and not to stir up mutiny or sedition. It was contended

(g) Vide 37 Geo. III. c. 70, ante, p. 321.

(h) The recitals in the preamble refer to the mutinies at Spithead and the Nore in 1797. See Annual Register, 1797, p. 209.

(i) Now penal servitude for not more than seven nor less than three years or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212).

(j) The oath was, ‘You shall be true to every journeyman sheerman, and not to hurt any of them, and you shall not divulge any of their secrets ; so help you God.’

that the words of the statute, however large in themselves, must be confined to the object stated in the preamble ; and could not have been intended to reach a case where it was plain that the fact arose entirely out of a private dispute between persons engaged in the same trade, and was confined in its object to that alone ; and that the general words therefore must be construed with relation to the antecedent offences, which are confined in their objects to mutiny and sedition. But the Court, though they did not upon the particular circumstances feel themselves called upon to give an express decision, appear to have entertained no doubt but that the case was within the statute (k).

Sixteen persons, with their faces blackened, met at a house at night, having guns with them, and intending to go out for the purpose of night poaching, and were all sworn not to betray their companions. It was objected that this oath was not within the statute, as it was not for a mutinous or seditious object, and that the statute only prohibited those oaths of secrecy which related to some illegal act, and that the word 'illegal' imported a criminal act, and not a mere civil trespass, whereas it was a mere civil trespass which was contemplated at the time when the oath was administered. It was held that the oath was within the statute ; and as to the assembly itself, and its object, it was impossible that a meeting to go out with faces thus disguised, at night, and under such circumstances, could be other than an unlawful assembly : in which case, the oath to keep it secret was an oath prohibited by the statute (l). An oath administered to the members of a trades' union, binding them not to make buttons for less than the lodge prices, and not to divulge the secrets of the lodge, was held to be an oath within the statute ; because to administer an oath or engagement not to reveal the secrets of any association is within the Act of 1797, as explained by subsequent statutes, not because it had reference to any matter respecting wages, but on the ground that every association of that kind, bound together by an oath, not to disclose the proceedings of that society, was for that reason an unlawful combination within the statutes (m).

An oath not to reveal what they saw or heard administered by members of an association, formed for the purpose of raising wages by a general strike on the part of its members, and for other purposes in furtherance of that design, was held to be within the Act of 1797 (n).

In R. v. Eadon (o), the prisoner was indicted under the Act of 1797 for administering to R. H. an oath taken by R. H. and intended to bind him to be of an association, society, and confederacy formed to disturb the public peace. The second count stated the oath to be intended to bind R. H. not to give evidence against any associate or confederate in such association. In other counts the word 'engagement' was

Lawrence, J., said : 'It is true that the preamble and the first part of the enacting clause are confined in their objects to cases of mutiny and sedition ; but it is nothing unusual in Acts of Parliament for the enacting part to go beyond the preamble ; the remedy often extends beyond the particular act or mischief which first suggests the necessity of substituted for 'oath.' The oath or engagement in question related to the Luddites, an organisation arising out of disputes in the stocking and lace trades, which broke the new machinery then coming into use in the stocking, lace, cotton, and woollen manufactures, and committed other acts of violence and destruction.

The evidence (p) proved the administering and taking of the oath, and the only question was whether R. H. took it in joke or in earnest. Le Blanc, J., ruled that if it was proved that the prisoner administered the oath without any mental reservation, and with the intention that it should be obligatory, the prisoner would be guilty, even if R. H. had merely taken the oath for the purpose of deluding the prisoner, and without meaning to bind his conscience (q).

The Unlawful Oaths Act, 1812 (52 Geo. III. c. 104), passed to render the Act of 1797 more effectual in respect to oaths of a particular nature, enacts (sect. 1), that 'every person, who shall in any manner or form whatsoever administer or cause to be administered, or be aiding or assisting at the administering of any oath or engagement, purporting or intending to bind the person taking the same to commit any treason (r) or murder, or any felony punishable by law with death, shall on conviction thereof by due course of law, be adjudged guilty of felony . . . (s), and every person who shall take any such oath or engagement, not being compelled thereto, shall, on conviction thereof by due course of law, be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall be transported as a felon for the term of his natural life (t), or for such term of years as the Court before which the said offender or offenders shall be tried shall adjudge.'

Persons taking the oaths mentioned in either of these Acts by compulsion must make a full disclosure of the fact, and the circumstances attending it, within a limited time, in order to be justified or excused. The Act of 1797 (sect. 2) enacts, that 'compulsion shall not justify or excuse any person taking such oath or engagement, unless he or she shall, within four days after the taking thereof, if not prevented by actual force or sickness, and then within four days after the hindrance produced by such force or sickness shall cease, declare the same, together with the whole of what he or she shall know touching the same, and the person or persons by whom and in whose presence and when and where such oath or engagement was administered or taken, by information on oath before one of His Majesty's justices of the peace or one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state or His Majesty's privy council, or in case the person taking such oath or engagement shall be in actual service in His Majesty's forces by sea or land, then by such information on oath as aforesaid, or by information to his commanding officer.' (s) The punishment of death originally imposed for this offence was abolished in 1837 by 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 91, s. 1. The punishment is now penal servitude for life, or for not less than three years, or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for not more than two years (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 91, s. 2; 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1 (1), (2), ante, pp. 211, 212).

(t) Now penal servitude for not more than seven nor less than three years, or imprisonment (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1 (1), (2), ante, pp. 211, 212).

(sect. 2) contains a similar enactment as to oaths or engagements within that Act, except that the words 'fourteen days' are substituted for 'four days.'

By sect. 5 of the Act of 1797, 'any engagement or obligation whatsoever in the nature of an oath,' and by sect. 6 of the Act of 1812, any engagement or obligation whatsoever in the nature of an oath purporting or intending to bind the person taking the same to commit any treason or murder, or any felony punishable by law with death, 'shall be deemed an oath within the intent and meaning of' those Acts, 'in whatever form or manner the same shall be administered or taken: and whether the same shall be actually administered by any person or persons to any other person or persons, or taken by any person or persons without any administration thereof by any other person or persons.'

If the oath administered was intended to make the party believe himself under an engagement, it is equally within the Acts, whether the book made use of be a testament or not (u). So the precise form of the oath is immaterial; it is an oath within the meaning of the Acts, if it was understood by the party tendering, and by the party taking it, as having the force and obligation of an oath (v).

Accessories, Aiders and Abettors.—The Act of 1797 enacts (sect. 3), that persons aiding and assisting at, or present and consenting to, the administering or taking of any oath or engagement before mentioned in that Act; and persons causing any such oath or engagement to be administered or taken, though not present at the administering or taking thereof, shall be deemed principal offenders, and tried as such; although the person or persons who actually administered such oath or engagement, if any such there shall be, shall not have been tried or convicted. By the Act of 1812 (sect. 4), 'persons aiding and assisting at the administration of any such oath or engagement as aforesaid, and persons causing any such oath or engagement to be administered, though not present at the administering thereof, shall be deemed principal offenders, and on conviction thereof by due course of law shall be adjudged guilty of felony . . . (w) although the persons or person who actually administered such oath or engagement, if any such there shall be, shall not have been tried or convicted' (x).

Both statutes provide that it shall not be necessary to set forth in the indictment 'the words of the oath or engagement;' and that 'it shall be sufficient to set forth the purport of such oath or engagement, or some material part thereof' (y). In an indictment on the Act of 1797, the fourth count charged that the defendants administered to J. H. an oath 'intended to bind him not to inform or give evidence against any member of a certain society formed to disturb the public peace for any act or expression of his or theirs done or made collectively or individually, in or out of that or other similar societies, in pursuance of the spirit of that obligation'; and the eighth count stated the oath to be 'intended to bind the said J. H. not to give evidence against any associate in certain associations and societies of persons formed for seditious purposes'; and the other counts stated the objects of the oath administered, and the objects of the society, differently and more generally adapted to several prohibitory parts of the statute. Upon objection taken at the trial to the generality of the statements in the indictment, Lord Alvanley was of opinion that the Act intended that it should be sufficient to allege and prove what the object of the oath and engagement was, without stating any words at all; and that the offence being described in the words of the Act, was well described; but that supposing the objection made to the generality of the counts was good, which he did not admit, yet that in the fourth and eighth a material part of the oath or engagement was set forth according to the terms of the Act. The point was submitted to the judges, who, without giving any opinion against the other counts, all agreed that the fourth and eighth counts were good (2).

If the indictment states the oath to have been not to inform or give evidence against any person belonging to a confederacy of persons associated together to do 'a certain illegal act,' it is sufficient without going on to state what the illegal act was: for the offence is not the illegal act, but the administration of the oath, which preceded it, and all that the rules of pleading require is that the offence—that is the oath itself—should be sufficiently described (a). Where an indictment charged that the prisoner administered 'a certain oath' to J. P. and fifteen others, naming them, and it was proved that the sixteen were all sworn in the same manner, on the same book, two or three at a time, at the same meeting, it was held that this was sufficient, for it was the same act of administering. Or it might be taken to be a complete transaction with respect to each person sworn; and the charge would be substantiated by evidence of the prisoner having sworn any one of the party, in the same way as a man may be convicted of larceny on proof of stealing one out of several articles named in an indictment (b).

Where the witness, swearing to the words spoken by way of oath by the prisoner when he administered it, said that he held a paper in his hand at the time when he administered the oath, from which paper it was supposed that he read the words; it was held that parol evidence of what he in fact said was sufficient, without giving him notice to produce such paper (c). And where the oath on the face of it did not purport to be for a seditious purpose, though it was objected that no parol evidence could be given to shew that the 'brotherhood' mentioned in it was of a seditious nature, it was held that declarations made at the time by the party administering such oath were admissible to prove the real object of it (d).

Both Acts provide that offences committed on the high seas, or out of the realm, or in England, shall and may be prosecuted, tried, and determined before any Court of Oyer and Terminer or Gaol Delivery for any

Both Acts also provide that 'any person who shall be tried and acquitted or convicted of any offence against' the Acts, 'shall not be liable to be prosecuted again for the same offence or fact as high treason, or misprision of high treason; and that nothing in the' Acts 'contained shall be construed to extend to prevent any person guilty of any offence against' the Acts, 'and who shall not be tried for the same as an offence against' the Acts, 'from being tried for the same, as high treason, or misprision of high treason, in such manner as if' those Acts 'had not been made' (f).

Neither Act extends to Ireland; but very similar provisions are made by the Unlawful Oaths (Ireland) Acts of 1810 (50 Geo. III. c. 102, ss. 1-4) and 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 87).

SECT. III.—OF COMBINATIONS AGAINST PUBLIC TRANQUILLITY AND THE GOVERNMENT.

The offences included in this section are closely allied to treason and sedition, but might also be described as conspiracies (ff), and the meetings of the societies at which the statutes are aimed could be dealt with as unlawful assemblies (g).

The Unlawful Societies Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. c. 79) (h), after reciting that a traitorous conspiracy had long been carried on in conjunction with the persons from time to time exercising the power of government in France to overturn the laws, constitution, and government, and every existing establishment, civil and ecclesiastical, both in Great Britain and Ireland, and to dissolve the conjunction of the two kingdoms, and that in pursuance of such design divers societies had been instituted in this kingdom and in Ireland, of a new and dangerous nature, inconsistent with public tranquillity and with the existence of regular government, particularly certain societies calling themselves 'Societies of United Englishmen, United Scotsmen, United Britons, United Irishmen, and The London Corresponding Society,' and that the members of many such societies had taken unlawful oaths and engagements of fidelity and secrecy, &c., and that it was expedient and necessary that all such societies, and all societies of the like nature, should be utterly suppressed and prohibited, as unlawful combinations and confederacies, highly dangerous to the peace and tranquillity of these kingdoms, and to the constitution of the government thereof, as by law to 39 as relates to the above-mentioned sections. But ss. 28, 29, 31, 34, 35 and 36 are re-enacted in the second schedule of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 42. By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 33, s. 1, also re-enacted in that schedule, 'No person shall be prosecuted or sued for any penalty imposed by the Act of 1799 unless such prosecution shall be commenced or such action shall be brought within three calendar months next after such penalty shall have been incurred.' or of any division, branch or committee of such society, to be held in his or her house or apartment, such person shall, for the first offence forfeit the sum of £5, and shall, for any offence committed after the date of his or her conviction for such first offence, be deemed guilty of an unlawful combination or confederacy in breach of this Act.'

By sect. 8, 'Every person who . . . after the passing of this Act (July 12, 1799) shall, in breach of the provisions thereof, be guilty of any such unlawful confederacy as in this Act is described, shall and may be proceeded against . . . by indictment to be preferred in the county, riding, division, city, town, or place in England, wherever such offence shall be committed . . . and every person convicted of any such offence upon indictment in due course of law shall and may be transported for the term of seven years in the manner provided by law for the transportation of offenders, or imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, as the Court before whom such offender shall be tried shall think fit . . . ' (k).

The Act of 1799 does not extend to declarations approved by two justices, and registered with the clerk of the peace; but such approbation shall only remain valid till the next general session, unless the same shall be confirmed by the major part of the justices at such general session (l). And it does not extend to the meetings of societies, or lodges of Freemasons, which, before the passing of the Act, had been usually held, under the denomination of 'Lodges of Freemasons,' and in conformity to the rules prevailing among such societies (m); provided that there be a certificate of two of the members upon oath, that such society or lodge had been usually held under such denomination, and in conformity to such rules; the certificate duly attested, &c., being, within two months after the passing of the Act, deposited with the clerk of the peace, with whom also the name or denomination of the society or lodge, and the usual place and time of meeting, and the names and descriptions of the members are to be registered yearly (n). The clerk of the peace is required to enrol such certificate and registry, and to lay the same once in every year before the general session of the justices; and the justices may, upon complaint upon oath, that the continuance of the meetings of any such lodge or society is likely to be injurious to the public peace and good order, direct them to be discontinued; and any such meeting, held notwithstanding such order of discontinuance, and before the same shall, by the like authority, be revoked, shall be deemed an unlawful combination and confederacy under the provisions of the Act (o).

(k) The omitted portions relate to summary convictions on which the justices may mitigate the maximum punishment—three months' imprisonment or a fine of £20. S. 9.

By sect. 10 it is provided, that any person who shall be convicted or acquitted by any justice, upon a summary prosecution, shall not afterwards be prosecuted by indictment, or otherwise, for the same offence ; and in like manner that any person convicted, or acquitted, upon an indictment, shall not afterwards be prosecuted before any justice in a summary way.

By sect. 11, the Act is not to ' extend to prevent any prosecution, by indictment or otherwise for anything which shall be an offence within the intent and meaning of this Act, and which might have been so prosecuted if the Act had not been made, unless the offender shall have been prosecuted for such offence under the Act, and convicted or acquitted of such offence ' (p).

By sect. 26, nothing contained in this Act is to extend to lodges of Freemasons, complying with the regulations of the Unlawful Societies Act, 1799 (v), nor to any declaration approved and subscribed by two or more justices of the peace, and confirmed by the major part of the justices at a general session, or at a general quarter sessions of the peace, pursuant to the regulations in the Act of 1799 (v); nor to meetings of Quakers; nor 'to any meeting or society formed or assembled for purposes of a religious or charitable nature only, and in which no other matter or business whatsoever shall be treated of or discussed.'

General in England, or the Lord-Advocate in Scotland, may order them to be stayed; and, in case of any judgment or conviction, one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state may, by an order under his hand, stay the execution of such judgment or conviction, or mitigate, or remit, any fine or forfeiture, or any part thereof (c).

The mutual promises and engagements of societies are lawful, unless they are clearly prohibited by law; and it lies on the party who alleges that such promises and engagements are illegal to prove that they are so. Where, therefore, it appeared from the rules of a lodge of Oddfellows that the members entered into an engagement to abide by the rules, and one of the rules was to keep the secrets of the society; but all secrets had been abolished; and the rules had not been enrolled: Erle, J., held that there was nothing to shew that the engagement was illegal; the subjects of this realm might enter into any engagement they pleased, unless prohibited by law, and the party objecting to the legality of an engagement must shew that it is illegal (d).

By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 33, it was enacted (sect. 1) that it should not be lawful for any person or persons to commence, enter, prosecute, or file, or cause or procure to be entered, prosecuted, or filed, any action, bill, plaint, or information in any of Her Majesty's Courts, or before any justice or justices of the peace, against any person for the recovery of any fine or forfeiture under the Acts of 1799 and 1817, except in the name of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General in England (e).

(c) S. 38 (damage by riot) was repealed as to England in 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27, s. 1). The Act does not extend to Ireland (s. 39). Many sections of 36 Geo. III. c. 8, were intended to remedy the evil occasioned by persons who, under pretence of delivering lectures and discourses on public grievances, delivered lectures and discourses, and held debates, tending to stir up hatred and contempt of the King's person and government, and of the constitution: but this statute was limited to a duration of three years from the passing of the Act, and until the end of the then session of Parliament, and was repealed in 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 24).

BOOK THE FOURTH.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO THE RIGHTS AND REVENUES OF THE CROWN.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO PRECIOUS METALS AND TREASURE TROVE.

A. Precious Metals.

Mines.—By its prerogative, the Crown has at common law a right of property in all mines of gold or silver (thesauri de terra) opened within the King's dominions, whether in lands of the Crown or of a subject (a). The prerogative was held to extend to mines of baser metal in which gold or silver was mixed, until the law was altered (b). By virtue of this prerogative, gold and silver mines, until aptly severed from the title of the Crown and vested in a subject, are not regarded as partes soli, or as incidents of the land where they are found (c), and do not pass out of the Crown except by apt and express words of grant (d). The severance of the minerals from the soil is not larceny, and the remedy for mining for gold or silver without royal licence is not by indictment or criminal information, but by English information for intrusion upon the rights of the Crown (e). Non-disclosure of gold or silver mines is said to be a concealment from the King (f), and punishable (g).

B. Treasure Trove.

By its prerogative the Crown is entitled to all treasure trove (thesaurus in terra), i.e., 'gold or silver in coin or plate or bullion,' 'found concealed in a house, or in the earth, or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown' (h). The royal right attaches on the hiding of the treasure, and not where it was casually lost or deliberately abandoned by being thrown into the sea or into a public place (i), in which case the finder is entitled to the property as against every one but the owner (j). In the case of Saltpetre (k), it is said that 'the King may dig in the land of a subject for treasure trove, for he hath the property.' This prerogative, described as one of the flowers of the Crown, may be devested by express grant to a subject (l). Until the Crown has acquired possession of treasure trove it is not the subject of larceny (m).

It is the duty of every person who finds, or knows of the finding of hidden treasure, to give notice to the coroner of the district within which it is found, who thereupon must hold an inquiry as to who were the finders and who is suspected thereof (n). Wilful and knowing concealment from the King of the finding of hidden treasure is a misdemeanor, now punishable by fine (or) imprisonment, or both (nn), which has been described as a form of misprision of felony (o). The offender may be proceeded against on the coroner's inquisition (p), or on indictment (q), or on both (r). It is not necessary in the indictment to aver that an inquisition was taken before the coroner or office found as to the title of the Crown (s). Indeed, the title of the Crown is independent of the findings of the inquest, and the coroner has no jurisdiction to inquire into the title to treasure as between Crown and subject (t). It is not necessary to prove that the concealment was fraudulent (u). Where B. found hidden treasure of gold, and believing it to be brass, offered to sell it to T. and others, who, knowing that it had been found, and was gold, bought it as brass and resold it as gold, and told lies to conceal the transaction, it was held that T. and the others were guilty of concealing treasure trove (v).

C. Bullion and Plate.

Bullion properly means gold or silver in the mass or lump, as distinguished from coin or manufactured articles. The term is, however, sometimes applied to coin or gold or silver wares and manufactures considered simply with reference to the value of the raw material (w).

R. v.

Thomas, L. & C. 313; 33 L. J. M. C. 22.

It is not necessary in an indictment for concealing treasure trove to allege an inquisition before the coroner or to shew the title of the Crown by office found. R. v. Toole, Ir. Rep. 2 C. 1. The melting down of coin was contrary to a series of enactments (x), which were repealed in 1819 (59 Geo. III. c. 49, s. 11). With a view more effectually to prevent the clipping, diminishing, or impairing coin of the realm, power was given for making entry to search for bullion, and to punish persons found in possession of bullion unless they could prove it to be lawful silver, and not before melting either coin or clippings (y).

2. The counterfeiting, exportation, and dealing with bullion were dealt with by statutes, all now repealed (z).

3. Frauds with respect to making, working, putting to sale, exchanging, selling, importing (a), or exporting gold or silver wares are regulated by a series of enactments (b), with the aim of securing the fineness required by the statutory standards and authenticated by the marks of the Goldsmiths Company. In the legislation now in force, which ranges from 1423 to 1907, such wares are usually described as gold or silver plate (c). Of the offences created by the statutes, except as to counterfeiting or transposing assay marks (d), many are outside the scope of this treatise, being usually penalties or forfeitures of specified sums or of the offending wares: and the residue fall within the class of frauds and cheats in trade, and do not affect the coin of the realm (e).

It has been held that knowingly exposing for sale and selling wrought gold under the sterling alloy as gold of the true standard, though indictable in goldsmiths, is a private imposition only in a common person, and the party injured is left to his civil remedy (f).

Offenders fraudulently affixing public and authentic marks on such wares of a value inferior to that indicated by the marks would seem to be indictable at common law as for a cheat, as well as incurring the penalties imposed by the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28) (post, Vol. ii. p. 1591). F., a working goldsmith, was indicted for falsifying plate, by putting in too much copper, and then corrupting one of the assay master's servants to help him to the proper assay marks, with which he stamped his plate, and sold it to the goldsmiths; and being convicted, he was fined £100 and adjudged to stand three times in the pillory; and was also forejudged of his trade that he should not use that trade again as a master workman (g).

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF OFFENCES WITH RESPECT TO COIN.

Most offences with respect to British or foreign coin committed in the United Kingdom are punishable under the Coinage Offences Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 99) (a). By the Coinage Colonial Offences Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 48), the provisions of the United Kingdom Acts, 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, and 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 90, as to coinage offences are to extend to and be in force in all British colonies and possessions abroad, except so far as by the law in force on August 4, 1853, in the colony, or by subsequent local legislation, provision was or should thereafter be made for the punishment of offences relating to the coin or the repeal of all or any of the extended enactments.

SECT. I.—DEFINITIONS AND GENERAL PROVISIONS.

King's Money.—The coin or money of this kingdom consists properly of what is called sterling money, made of gold or silver only, with a certain alloy, coined and issued by the King's authority: and such money is supposed to be referred to by any statute naming 'money' generally (b).

By the Coinage Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 10, s. 5), no piece of gold, silver, copper, or bronze, or of any metal or mixed metal of any value whatever, shall be made or issued except by the mint as a coin or a token for money, or as purporting that the holder thereof is entitled to demand any value denoted thereon. Every person who acts in contravention of this section is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

The weight, alloy, impression, and denomination of the coin of the realm was for many centuries settled by indenture between the King and the master of the mint. The standard of coins is now regulated by the Coinage Acts, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 10), 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 58), 1891, and 1893. Proclamation is not essential to give currency to coin; but the currency of any given pattern or denomination of coin is regulated by proclamation of the King. The proclamations have since 1870 been issued under sect. 11 of the Coinage Act, 1870. These proclamations

(a) This superseded 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, which was repealed by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, s. 1. Prior to 1832 counterfeiting the King's money was punishable by a series of statutes, beginning with the Treason Act, 1351 (25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2), under most of which the offence was treated as treason, as it affected the prerogative of the Crown with reference to the coining and legalisation of money. 1 East, P.C. 147; 1 Hale, cc. 17, 18, 19, 20.

(b) 1 East, P.C. 147; 1 Hale, cc. 17, 18, 19, 20. Coin of brass, &c., was not within the definition. 1 Hawk. c. 17, s. 57.

have effect as if enacted in the statute (sect. 11). They need not be proved (c), but are printed as statutory rules and orders and can be proved by an official edition or print. In prosecutions for coining, it may be of use in case of any new coin with a new impression, not yet familiar to the people, to produce the relevant proclamation or one of the officers of the mint cognisant of the fact, or the stamps used, or the like evidence. But in general, whether the coin is the King's current coin or not is a mere question of fact which may be found upon evidence of common usage or notoriety (d). Any coin, once legally made and issued by the King's authority, continues to be the current coin of the kingdom until decreed or recalled, notwithstanding any change in the authority by which it was constituted (e). His Majesty in council may direct the establishment of any branch of the mint in any British possession, and make the coins issued by it a legal tender (f). His Majesty in council may direct that foreign coins may be a legal tender in any part of his dominions (g).

The Coinage Offences Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 99), which applies to the whole of the United Kingdom (h), contains the following definitions, sect. 1: that, 'In the interpretation of and for the purposes of this Act, the expression—

"The King's current gold or silver coin," shall include any gold or silver coin coined in any of His Majesty's mints, or (i) lawfully current, by virtue of any proclamation or otherwise (ii), in any part of His Majesty's dominions, whether within the United Kingdom or otherwise; and the expression—

"The King's copper coin," shall include any copper coin and any coin of bronze or mixed metal coined in any of His Majesty's mints, or lawfully current, by virtue of any proclamation or otherwise, in any part of His Majesty's said dominions; and the expression—

"False or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current gold or silver coin," shall include any of the current coin which shall have been gilt, silvered, washed, coloured, or cased over, or in any manner altered, so as to resemble or be apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current coin of a higher denomination; and the expression—

"The King's current coin" shall include any coin coined in any of

(i) The word 'or' in this and the subsequent definitions was substituted for the word 'and' used in 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 21, and the words 'in virtue of any proclamation or otherwise' were added, so as to bring all coin lawfully current within the British Empire within the scope of the Act.

Possession.—And where the having any matter in the custody or possession of any person is mentioned in this Act, it shall include, not only the having of it by himself in his personal custody or possession, but also the knowingly and wilfully having it in the actual custody or possession of any other person, and also the knowingly and wilfully having it in any dwelling-house or other building, lodging, apartment, field, or other place, open or inclosed, whether belonging to or occupied by himself or not, and whether such matter shall be so had for his own use or benefit or for that of any other person' (k).

Right to test Suspected Coin.—By sect. 26, 'Where any coin shall be tendered as the King's current gold or silver coin to any person who shall suspect the same to be diminished otherwise than by reasonable wearing, or to be counterfeit, it shall be lawful for such person to cut, break, bend, or deface such coin; and if any coin so cut, broken, bent, or defaced shall appear to be diminished otherwise than by reasonable wearing, or to be counterfeit, the person tendering the same shall bear the loss thereof; but if the same shall be of due weight, and shall appear to be lawful coin, the person cutting, breaking, bending, or defacing the same is hereby required to receive the same at the rate it was coined for; and if any dispute shall arise whether the coin so cut, broken, bent, or defaced be diminished in manner aforesaid, or counterfeit, it shall be heard and finally determined in a summary manner by any justice of the peace, who is hereby empowered to examine upon oath as well the parties as any other person, in order to the decision of such dispute; and the tellers at the receipt of His Majesty's Exchequer, and their deputies and clerks, and the receivers general of every branch of His Majesty's revenue, are hereby required to cut, break, or deface, or cause to be cut, broken, or defaced, every piece of counterfeit or unlawfully diminished gold or silver coin which shall be tendered to them in payment of any part of His Majesty's revenue' (l).

Seizure of Suspected or Counterfeit Coin and Coining Tools.—By sect. 27, 'If any person shall find or discover in any place whatever, or in the custody or possession of any person having the same without lawful authority or excuse, any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current gold, silver, or copper coin, or any coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, or any

(j) The definition of current coin was new in 1861. The word include 'used' in this and the preceding definitions is not a word of limitation, but of extension. It has, therefore, been held that a genuine sovereign has been made false and counterfeit which had been fraudulently filed at the edges, thereby reducing its weight by one twenty-fourth, and by destroying the old milling, in place whereof a new milling of the edges had been made, so as to make the coin look like a current coin. *R. v. instrument, tool, or engine whatsoever adapted and intended for the counterfeiting of any such coin, or any filings or clippings, or any gold or silver bullion, or any gold or silver in dust, solution, or otherwise, which shall have been produced or obtained by diminishing or lightening any of the King's current gold or silver coin, it shall be lawful for the person so finding or discovering, and he is hereby required, to seize the same, and to carry the same forthwith, before some justice of the peace; and where it shall be proved, on the oath of a credible witness, before any justice of the peace, that there is reasonable cause to suspect that any person has been concerned in counterfeiting the King's current gold, silver, or copper coin, or any such foreign or other coin as in this Act before mentioned, or has in his custody or possession any such false or counterfeit coin, or any instrument, tool, or engine whatsoever adapted and intended for the making or counterfeiting of any such coin, or any other machine used or intended to be used for making or counterfeiting any such coin, or any such filings, clippings, or bullion or any such gold or silver in dust, solution, or otherwise, as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, by warrant under his hand, to cause any place whatsoever belonging to or in the occupation or under the control of such suspected person to be searched, either in the day or in the night, and if any such false or counterfeit coin, or any such instrument, tool, or engine, or any such machine, or any such filings, clippings, or bullion or any such gold or silver in dust, solution, or otherwise as aforesaid, shall be found in any place so searched, to cause the same to be seized and carried forthwith before some justice of the peace; and whensoever any such false or counterfeit coin, or any such instrument, tool, or engine, or any such machine, or any such filings, clippings, or bullion, or any such gold or silver in dust, solution, or otherwise, as aforesaid, shall in any case whatsoever be seized and carried before a justice of the peace, he shall, if necessary, cause the same to be secured, for the purpose of being produced in evidence against any person who may be prosecuted for any offence against this Act; and all such false and counterfeit coin, and all instruments, tools, and engines adapted and intended for the making or counterfeiting of coin, and all such machines, and all such filings, clippings, and bullion, and all such gold and silver in dust, solution, or otherwise, as aforesaid, after they shall have been produced in evidence, or when they shall have been seized, and shall not be required to be produced in evidence, shall forthwith be delivered up to the officers of His Majesty's Mint, or to the solicitors of His Majesty's Treasury (m), or any person authorized by them to receive the same (n).

Proof of Coin being Counterfeit.—By sect. 29, 'Where upon the trial of any person charged with any offence against this Act it shall be necessary to prove that any coin produced in evidence against such person is false or counterfeit, it shall not be necessary to prove the same to be false and counterfeit by the evidence of any moneyer, or other officer of His Majesty's Mint, but it shall be sufficient to prove the same to be false or counterfeit by the evidence of any other credible witness' (o).

Where the Offence is Complete.—By sect. 30, 'Every offence of falsely making or counterfeiting any coin, or of buying, selling, receiving, paying, tendering, uttering, or putting off, or of offering to buy, sell, receive, pay, utter, or put off, any false or counterfeit coin, against the provisions of this Act, shall be deemed to be complete, although the coin so made or counterfeited, or bought, sold, received, paid, tendered, uttered, or put off, or offered to be bought, sold, received, paid, uttered, or put off, shall not be in a fit state to be uttered, or the counterfeiting thereof shall not be finished or perfected' (p).

Power to apprehend Persons found committing Offences.—Sect. 31. 'It shall be lawful for any person whatsoever to apprehend any person who shall be found committing any indictable offence, or any high crime and offence, or crime and offence, against this Act, and to convey or deliver him to some peace officer, constable, or officer of police, in order to his being conveyed as soon as reasonably may be before a justice of the peace or some other proper officer, to be dealt with according to law' (q).

Misdemeanors, Fine, &c.—Sect. 38. 'Whenever any person shall be convicted of any indictable misdemeanor punishable under this Act, the Court may, if it shall think fit, in addition to or in lieu of any of the punishments by this Act authorised, fine the offender, and require him to enter into his own recognizances, and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace and being of good behaviour; and in case of any felony punishable under this Act the Court may, if it shall think fit, require the offender to enter into his own recognizances and to find sureties, both or either, for keeping the peace, in addition to any punishment by this Act authorised; provided that no person shall be imprisoned under this clause, for not finding sureties for any period exceeding one year' (r). The offender may also be dealt with under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907 (s).

The provisions of sects. 39 and 40 as to hard labour and solitary confinement have been superseded by other legislation (t), and repealed in 1893 (S. L. R.). Sect. 42, which related to the payment of the costs in England, was repealed in 1908 (u).

(o) Taken from 2 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 17, vide ante, p. 343.

(p) Taken from 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 3, which was limited in terms to making or counterfeiting gold or silver coin, and it was held not to apply to selling counterfeit coin. The words in italics have, therefore, been added in order to include all cases of 'buying, selling,' &c. See R. v. Bradford, 2 Cawf. & Dix, Ir. Circ. Rep. 41.

(q) This clause is clearly unnecessary, so far as it relates to any felony or indictable misdemeanor, for there is no doubt whatever that any person in the act of committing any such offence is liable by the common law to be apprehended by any person; but it was introduced at the instigation of the Solicitors of the Treasury, as it had been found that there was great unwillingness to apprehend in such cases, in consequence of doubts that prevailed among the public as to the right to do so.

The words, 'or officer of police,' were introduced in the House of Commons quite unnecessarily, as without doubt every officer of police is a peace officer; and they render this clause inconsistent with other clauses in some of the other Acts. C. S. G.

SECT. II.—PUNISHMENT AND VENUE.

General Rule.—The punishment of offences relating to the coin is, as to the maximum term of penal servitude, fixed by the enactment defining each offence, and if no maximum is fixed by the statute the maximum term is five years. By the Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69), s. 1, the minimum term of penal servitude is fixed at three years (v); and in lieu of penal servitude the Court may in its discretion (unless an Act passed since August 5, 1891, otherwise provides) award imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour. Principals in the second degree and accessories before the fact to felonies within the Act are punishable as principal offenders; and accessories after the fact are liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years (w). The provisions of the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, as to punishment superseded by this section were repealed by the Statute Law Revision Acts of 1892 and 1893, and are omitted from the text of this work (x).

Accessories and Accomplices.—Accomplices in offences concerning the coin which amount to felony, follow the general rule applicable to felony. If two agree to counterfeit, and one does it in consequence of that agreement, both are guilty. If one counterfeits, and another by agreement beforehand afterwards puts it off; the latter is a principal. So if he puts it off afterwards, knowing that the other coined it; or if he furnished the coiner with tools, or materials for coining (y).

Proof that a man occasionally visited coiners; that the rattling of money was occasionally heard with them; that he was seen counting something as if it was money when he left them; that, on coming to the lodgings just after their apprehension, he endeavoured to escape, and was found to have bad money about him; is not sufficient evidence to implicate him, as counselling, procuring, aiding, and abetting the coining (z).

Venue.—By sect. 28, ‘Where any person shall tender, utter, or put off any false or counterfeit coin in one county or jurisdiction, and shall also tender, utter, or put off any other false or counterfeit coin in any other county or jurisdiction, either on the day of such first mentioned tendering, uttering, or putting off, or within the space of ten days next ensuing, or where two or more persons, acting in concert in different counties or jurisdictions, shall commit any offence against this Act, every such offender may be dealt with, indicted, tried, and punished, and the offence laid and charged to have been committed, in any one of the said counties or jurisdictions, in the same manner in all respects as if the offence had been actually and wholly committed within such one county or jurisdiction’ (a).

(v) Ante, pp. 211, 212. The Act of 1861 contained a minimum term of three years, raised to five in 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2), but restored to three by the Act of 1891.

Offences in Admiralty Jurisdiction.—By sect. 36, ‘All indictable offences mentioned in this Act which shall be committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England or Ireland shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature and liable to the same punishments as if they had been committed upon the land in England or Ireland, and may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in any county or place in England or Ireland in which the offender shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if the same had been actually committed in that county or place; and in any indictment for any such offence, or for being accessory to any such offence, the venue in the margin shall be the same as if such offence had been committed in such county or place, and the offence itself shall be averred to have been committed “on the high seas”; . . . provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect any of the laws relating to the government of His Majesty’s land or naval forces’ (b).

SECT. III.—OF COUNTERFEITING COIN.

A. British Coin.

King’s Gold and Silver Coin.—Sect. 2. ‘Whosoever shall falsely make or counterfeit any coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King’s current gold or silver coin, shall in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . .’ (c).

Colouring Coin or Pieces of Metal with Intent to make them pass for British Gold or Silver Coin.—Sect. 3. ‘Whosoever shall gild or silver, or shall, with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold or of silver, or by any means whatsoever, wash, case over, or colour any coin whatsoever resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King’s current gold or silver coin; or shall gild or silver, or shall, with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold or of silver, or by any means whatsoever, wash, case over, or colour any piece of silver or copper, or of coarse gold or coarse silver, or of any metal or mixture of metals respectively, being of a fit size and figure to be coined, and with intent that the same shall be coined into false and counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King’s current gold or silver coin; or shall gild, or shall, with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold, or by any means whatsoever, wash, case over, or colour any of the King’s current silver coin, or file or in any manner alter such coin, with intent to make the same resemble or pass for any of the King’s current gold coin; or shall gild or silver, or shall, with any wash or materials capable of producing the the offence created by that section is only a misdemeanor, probably there was no substantial ground for that doubt, but it was thought better to set the matter at rest.

colour or appearance of gold or silver, or by any means whatsoever, wash, case over, or colour any of the King's current copper coin, or file or in any manner alter such coin, with intent to make the same resemble or pass for any of the King's current gold or silver coin, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . ' (d).

Counterfeiting the King's Copper Coin.—Sect. 14. ' Whosoever shall falsely make or counterfeit any coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current copper coin . . . shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . . ' (e).

The counterfeiting of copper coin was only a misdemeanor at common law (f), such coin not being the King's money within the Statute of Treasons (g). It was first made felony in 1771 (h).

Selling Medals resembling Current Coin.—By the Counterfeit Medal Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 45), s. 2, ' If any person without due authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) makes or has in his possession for sale, or offers for sale, or sells, any medal, cast, coin, or any other like thing, made wholly or partially of metal or any metallic combination and resembling in size, figure, and colour any of the King's current gold or silver coin, or having thereon a device resembling any device on any of the King's current gold or silver coin, or being so formed that it can by gilding, silvering, colouring, washing, or other like process, be so dealt with as to resemble any of the King's current gold or silver coin, he shall be guilty in England and Ireland of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and on being convicted shall be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, with or without hard labour.' By sect. 3 ' " The King's current gold or silver coin " includes any gold or silver coin coined in or for any of His Majesty's mints, or lawfully current by virtue of any proclamation or otherwise

(d) Taken from 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 4, with the addition of the words in italics. The words omitted are repealed. For other punishments vide ante, p. 348 et seq. The words ' by any means whatsoever,' were introduced in order to include every process by which false metal can be made to appear like gold or silver, whether such appearance be produced by galvanism or otherwise howsoever. The order of the words in the former section was ' wash, colour, or case over,' and it was advisedly altered. On an indictment under 8 & 9 Will. III. c. 26, s. 4 (rep.), the use of aqua fortis to draw to the surface of base metals the silver latent therein was held to be colouring with silver. R. v. Lavey, 1 Leach, 153; 1 East, P.C. 106. And on another indictment on the same statute where blanks (made of an alloy of brass and silver) had to be taken out of a wash and rubbed to give them the appearance of silver, the preparing and steeping them in the wash was held to be colouring. R. v. Case, 1 Leach, 154n.; 1 East, P.C. 106. Certain differences of opinion among the judges in this case appear to have led to the substitution for the words ' materials producing the colour ' in the Act of William III. of the words ' materials capable of producing the colour, &c., ' in 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 4, and in the present enactment. In R. v. Turner, 2 Mood. 42, an indictment containing the words ' capable, &c. ' it was proved that the accused was found gilding sixpences with gold. It was contended that the words ' capable, &c. ' excluded gold and applied only to imitation substances. But a verdict of guilty was given and was sustained by the majority of the consulted judges.

in any part of His Majesty's dominions, whether within the United Kingdom or otherwise.'

Counterfeit Coin by Officers in the Mint.—Not only those who counterfeit the King's coin without his authority, but even persons employed in the mint or its branches are within the Coinage Offences Act, 1861, if for their own lucre they make the money of baser alloy, or lighter than they are authorised and bound by law to do: for they can only justify coining at all under the Coinage Acts and proclamations, and the terms of their appointment; and if they have not pursued that authority, it is the same as if they had none. But mere mistake in weight or alloy will not make them guilty; the act must be wilful, corrupt, and fraudulent (i).

What is Counterfeiting.—To be counterfeit within the statute, the coin must resemble or be apparently intended to resemble or pass for a genuine coin (j), but this resemblance is a matter of fact of which the jury are to judge upon the evidence before them; the rule being, that the resemblance need not be perfect, but such as may in circulation ordinarily impose upon the world (k). Thus a counterfeiting with some small variation in the inscription, effigies, or arms, done probably with intent to evade the law is yet within it; and so is the counterfeiting in a different metal, if in appearance it be made to resemble the true coin (l).

By sect. 30 of the Act of 1861 (ante, p. 347), the offence is complete even if the counterfeiting is not finished or perfected nor the coin in a fit state to be uttered (m). It is laid down by old authorities that if there is a counterfeiting in fraud of the King, the offence is complete before any uttering, or attempt to utter (n).

On an indictment for uttering a counterfeit half-sovereign, the coin uttered was a Prince of Wales's medal; and though on one side it bore some resemblance to a good half-sovereign, having Queen Victoria's head and the usual inscription, on the other side was the plume of the Prince of Wales, with the words 'Prince of Wales's model half-sovereign.' It was held that it was a question for the jury whether the coin was intended by the maker to pass as a counterfeit coin, or was merely designed for a plaything, a card-marker, &c. (o).

There is a sufficient counterfeiting where the counterfeit money is made to resemble coin, the impression on which has been worn away by time (p).

The Court were of opinion that a blank that is smoothed and made like a piece of legal coin, the impression of which is worn

B. Foreign Coin.

Counterfeit Foreign Gold and Silver Coin.—Sect. 18 (q). ‘Whosoever shall make or counterfeit any kind of coin, not being the King’s current gold or silver coin, but resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any gold or silver coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, shall in England and Ireland be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . .’ (r).

Counterfeit Foreign Coin other than Gold and Silver Coin.—Sect. 22 (s). ‘Whosoever shall falsely make or counterfeit any kind of coin, not being the King’s current coin, but resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any copper coin, or any other coin made of any metal or mixed metals of less value than the silver coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, shall in England and Ireland be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . for the first offence to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, and for the second offence, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . .’ (t).

SECT. IV.—IMPAIRING AND DEFACING CURRENT COIN.

Impairing Gold or Silver Coin, with intent.—Sect. 4 (u) enacts that, ‘Whosoever shall impair, diminish, or lighten any of the King’s current gold or silver coin, with intent that the coin so impaired, diminished, or lightened may pass for the King’s current gold or silver coin, shall in England and Ireland be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years . . .’ (v).

Unlawful Possession of Filings or Clippings of Gold or Silver Coin.—Sect. 5 (w). ‘Whoever shall unlawfully have in his custody or possession out, and yet suffered to remain in circulation, is sufficiently counterfeited to the similitude of the current coin of this realm to bring the counterfeiters and coiners of such blanks within the statute; these blanks having some reasonable likeness to that coin which has been defaced by time, and yet passed in circulation. In R. v. Walsh, 1 Leach, 364, 1 East, P.C. 164, the counsel for the prisoners having objected, upon the fact of no impression of any sort or kind being discernible upon the shillings produced in evidence, that they were not counterfeited to the likeness and similitude of the good and legal coin of the realm, the judges were of opinion, that it was a question of fact whether the counterfeit monies were of the likeness and similitude of the lawful current silver coin called a shilling. And the jury having so found it, the want of an impression was immaterial; because, from the impression being generally worn out or defaced, it was notorious that the currency of the genuine coin of that denomination was not thereby affected; the counterfeit therefore was perfect for circulation, and possibly might deceive the more readily from having no appearance of an impression: and in the deception the offence consists.

The words in italics have therefore been substituted for those of the former enactment. C. S. G.

Defacing Coin by Stamping Words thereon.—Sect. 16. ' Whosoever shall deface any of the King's current gold, silver, or copper coin, by stamping thereon any names or words, whether such coin shall or shall not be thereby diminished or lightened, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, with or without hard labour ' (y).

Tender of Coin so Defaced not Legal.—Sect. 17. ' No tender or payment in money made in any gold, silver, or copper coin so defaced by stamping as in the last preceding section mentioned shall be allowed to be a legal tender ; and whosoever shall tender, utter, or put off any coin so defaced shall, on conviction thereof before two justices, be liable to forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding forty shillings ; Provided that it shall not be lawful for any person to proceed for any such last-mentioned penalty without the consent, in England or Ireland, of His Majesty's Attorney-General for England or Ireland respectively, or in Scotland of the Lord Advocate ' (z).

Counterfeit British Coin.—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 7 (a), ' Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party

(a) Taken from 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 6, with the alterations and additions italicised. As to the first words in italics, see s. 6, post, p. 364. The words ' or receive ' were added to cover cases where the evidence was insufficient to prove that the receiver had imported the coin. The section appears to apply to importation from any place beyond seas within or without the King's dominions. Under 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 11 (rep.) it was held that the words ' false or counterfeit coin or money being current within this realm,' referred to gold and silver coin of foreign realms, current here by the sufferance and consent of the Crown, which must be by proclamation, or by writ under the great seal. And the money, the bringing in of which was prohibited by 25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2, and 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 11 (rep.), must be brought from some foreign place out of the King's dominions into some place within the same (1 East, P.C. 175), and not from Ireland or some other place subject to the Crown of England, for though to some purposes they are distinct from England, yet as the counterfeiting was punishable there as much as in England, the bringing money from such places was not within those Acts (1 Hawk. c. 17, s. 87). It may be observed also that these Acts were confined to the importer (using the word ' bring '), and did not extend to a receiver at second hand ; and such importer must also have been averred and proved to have known that the money was counterfeit. 1 Hale, 227, 228, 317 ; 1 Hawk. c. 17, ss. 86, 88 ; 1 East, P.C. c. 4. It seems not to have been necessary under 25 Edw. III. s. 5, c. 2, to prove that false money was actually paid away or accused), shall import or receive into the United Kingdom from beyond the seas any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current gold or silver coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . ' (b).

By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 48, s. 2, 'If any person shall import into any of His Majesty's Colonies or possessions abroad any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of His Majesty's current gold or silver coin coined in any of His Majesty's Mints, whether in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, he shall be liable . . . to be transported for life' (c).

By the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), ss. 150–151, the importation of base or counterfeit coin (by sea or land carriage) into Mauritius and the British possessions in America is absolutely prohibited.

By the Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 42), imitation coin is included in the table of goods prohibited and restricted under the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (vide post, p. 374).

Importing Foreign Counterfeit Gold or Silver Coin.—By sect. 19 (d), 'Whosoever, without law'ul authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall bring or receive into the United Kingdom (e) any such (f) false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any gold or silver coin of any foreign prince, state, or country, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . . ' (g).

By sect. 2 of the Customs Amendment Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 41), power is given to His Majesty to make and revoke proclamations prohibiting the importation into the United Kingdom of coins coined in a foreign country specified in the proclamation. Such coins during the currency of the proclamation are treated as prohibited goods within the merchandised with. 1 Hawk. c. 17, s. 89. Coke and Hale seem to have thought differently. 3 Co. Inst. 18; 1 Hale, 229. But see 1 East, P.C. 175, 176, where it is said that though the best trial and proof of an intent may be by the act done, yet it may also be evinced by a variety of circumstances, of which the jury are to judge.

(c) This enactment applies to a colony only so far as provision is not made by local legislation (ss. 3, 4).

(d) Framed on 37 Geo. III. c. 126, s. 3, omitting the words 'with intent to utter the same,' which were in the former statute. From the words of the present Act (s. 19), an importation of counterfeit foreign coin, with a knowledge that it is counterfeit, is clearly sufficient, without any actual uttering. It seems that 37 Geo. III. c. 126, did not provide for the case of a person collecting the base money therein mentioned from the vendors of it in this country, with intent to utter it within the realm, or the dominions of the realm. See 1 East, P.C. 177. 'Bringing' over counterfeit foreign coin was treason within 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 11 (rep.). 1 Hawk. c. 17, s. 89. The Act of 1861 has neither the words 'to merchandise or make payment,' which were in 25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2, nor the words 'to the intent to utter or make payment with the same,' which were in 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 11. The crime, therefore, seems now to consist in importing counterfeit coin knowing it to be counterfeit. C. S. G.

SECT. VI.—OF EXPORTING COUNTERFEIT CURRENT COIN.

By sect. 8, 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall export, or put on board any ship, vessel, or boat for the purpose of being exported from the United Kingdom, any false or counterfeit coin, resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour . . . ' (i).

The definition of current coin includes the coin of British possessions and protectorates as well as coin of the realm (j).

SECT. VII.—OF UTTERING, TENDERING, &C., COUNTERFEIT COIN.

A. Common Law and Former Statutes.

Formerly the putting off counterfeit money might amount to treason. Thus if A. counterfeited current gold or silver coin, and by agreement before that counterfeiting B. was to put off and vend the counterfeit money, B. was an aider and abettor to such counterfeiting, and consequently liable as a principal traitor (k). In the case of copper coin, B. acting a similar part was an accessory before the fact to the felony, within 11 Geo. III. c. 40 (l). And if B., knowing that A. had counterfeited coin, put off this false coin for him 'after the fact,' without any such agreement precedent to the counterfeiting, he seems to have been liable as an accessory after the fact to A., because he maintains him (m). According to Coke (n), if money, false or clipped, were found in the hands of any suspicious person, he might be imprisoned until he proved his warrant per statutum de moneta (20 Edw. I. stats. 4, 5, 6 (rep.)).

If A. counterfeited the King's money, and B. knowing the money to be counterfeited uttered the same for his own benefit, B. was not guilty of treason, nor misprision of treason. But he was liable at common law to be punished as for a cheat (o). The defendant was indicted for punishable under 15 Geo. II. c. 28 (rep.). See precedents of indictments for a misdemeanor at common law in uttering a counterfeit half-guinea: Cro. Circ. Comp. 315 (7th ed.); 2 Chit. Cr. L. 116. See also a precedent of an indictment for a misdemeanor at common law, against a man for uttering a counterfeit sixpence, and having another found in his custody: Cro. Circ. Comp. 315 (7th ed.); 2 Chit. Cr. L. 117. The uttering of false money, knowing it to be false, is mentioned as a misdemeanor in ‘unlawfully uttering and tendering in payment to T. H. ten counterfeit halfpence, knowing them to be counterfeit.’ One count laid the offence as contrary to the statute, a second count laid the offence generally. He was convicted on the second count. It was admitted that no statute applied to the case of counterfeit copper coin, and on a case reserved all the judges held the offence not to be indictable (p).

Possession of counterfeit coin of the realm with intent to utter it is not an offence at common law (q). But the unlawful procuring of counterfeit coin with intent to circulate it, though no act of uttering be proved, is a misdemeanor at common law (r), and the possession of counterfeit coin under suspicious circumstances, and without any circumstances to induce a belief that the defendant was the maker, was held to be evidence of unlawful procuring with intent to utter (s). Upon the argument in R. v. Fuller (s), Thomson, C.B., mentioned a case where he had directed an acquittal, because from certain powder found upon the prisoner, there was a presumption that he was the maker of the coin.

B. Of Uttering or Possessing Counterfeit British Coin.

Uttering Counterfeit Gold or Silver Current Coin.—By sect. 9, ‘Whosoever shall tender, utter, or put off any false or counterfeit coin, resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King’s current gold or silver coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, with or without hard labour . . .’ (t).

There is also a precedent for a misdemeanor at common law, in uttering, and causing to be uttered as good, guineas which had been filed or diminished : Cro. Circ. Comp. 317 (7th ed.), and 2 Chit. Cr. L. 116 ; and also a precedent for a misdemeanor at common law in selling counterfeit Dutch guilders ; Cro. Circ. Comp. 313 (7th ed.) ; 2 Chit. Cr. L. 119, 120.

(r) R. v. Fuller [1816], R. & R. 308, and MS. Bayley, J. In R. v. Brown, 1 Lew. 42, upon an indictment for procuring counterfeit money with intent to utter it, the uttering the money, knowing it to be counterfeit, was held evidence that it was procured with that intent. Holroyd, J., there seemed to consider a procurement elsewhere, with intent to utter, a continuing procurement in the county where the uttering took place.

(s) R. v. Fuller [1816], R. & R. 308. The possession in this case was under particularly suspicious circumstances ; on the prisoner were found two parcels, each containing twenty shillings, wrapped up with soft paper to prevent their rubbing. In the marginal note to R. v. Parker, 1 Leach, 41, it is stated that having the possession of counterfeit money with intention to pay it away as and for good money, is an indictable offence at common law. This may be criminal in some cases of such possession, as we have seen above ; but, quære, if the point, as stated in the marginal note, was actually decided in Parker’s case. See also R. v. Jarvis, Dears. 552, post, p. 362.

(t) Taken from 2 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 7. For other punishments, vide ante, p. 348. Under 8 & 9 Will. III. c. 26, s. 6 (rep.), which had the words ‘take, receive, pay, or put off,’ it was necessary to prove actual passing of the money. R. v. Wooldridge, 1 Leach, 307 ; 1 East, P.C. 179. The word ‘tender’ in the present Act obviates the need of proving actual passing. C. S. G. Under 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 7 (rep.), it was held that a charge of uttering and putting off was proved by evidence that the prisoner had entered a shop, and had asked for tea and sugar, and had in payment placed on the counter a counterfeit shilling, but on being told that it was bad, had left the shop and left the coin behind. R. v. Welch, 2 Den. 78. Cf. R. v. Ion, ibid. 475.

The words 'tender, utter, or put off,' being in the disjunctive, appear to apply to the uttering of counterfeit money though not tendered in payment, but passed by the common trick of ringing the changes (v).

Uttering Counterfeit Gold or Silver Current Coin accompanied by Possession of other such Coin, or followed by a Second Uttering of other such Coin.—Sect. 10. 'Whosoever shall tender, utter, or put off any false or counterfeit coin resembling, or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current gold or silver coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, and shall, at the time of such tendering, uttering, or putting off, have in his custody or possession, besides the false or counterfeit coin so tendered, uttered, or put off, any other piece of false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current gold or silver coin, or shall, either on the day of such tendering, uttering, or putting off, or within the space of ten days then next ensuing, tender, utter, or put off any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current gold or silver coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour . . . ' (v).

Where one of two persons utters base coin, and other base coin is found on the other, they are jointly guilty of the aggravated offence under this section, if they are acting in concert, and the one knows of the possession of the base coin by the other; for by the interpretation clause the having any coin in possession includes 'the knowing and wilfully having it in the actual custody or possession of any other person'; and as it is clear that under that clause a man may have possession of coin in a house or other place, though he is far away, so the possession of coin by one man may be the possession of another within that clause, though they are at a great distance from each other (w).

Having Three or More Pieces of Counterfeit Gold or Silver Coin in Possession, &c., with Intent, &c.—Sect. 11. 'Whosoever shall have in

(v) See R. v. Franks, 2 Leach, 644, decided on 15 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 2 (rep.), which had the words 'utter or tender in payment.' In that case the prosecutor having bargained for the purchase of sixpenny-worth of fruit from the defendant, a street vendor, handed to the defendant a good shilling to change. The defendant put the shilling into his mouth as if to bite it, and returned a shilling to the prosecutor, saying that it was bad. The prosecutor having handed him a second and a third shilling, the defendant practised the same trick as to each.

(v) Taken from 2 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 7. The words 'any other piece' are substituted for 'one or more piece or pieces,' and the words 'any false or counterfeit coin' for 'any more or other false or counterfeit coin.' The words omitted are repealed. To warrant the punishment imposed by this section, the utterings should be charged in the same count of the indictment. See R. v. Martin [1801], coram Graham, B., decided by the judges on 15 Geo. II. c. 28 (rep.). 2 Leach, 923; 1 East, P.C. xviii.; MS. Bayley, J. Convictions for separate utterings on the same day, charged in separate counts of the indictment, do not seem to warrant such punishment. See R. v. Tandy, 2 Leach, 833. 1 East, P.C. 182, 184: decided on 15 Geo. II. c. 28 (rep.). Eyre, C.J., Buller, J., and Heath, J., were absent when this opinion was given, viz., Hil. T. 1799. The judges also thought it advisable to give judgment of imprisonment for six months singly, and not on each of the counts. And see R. v. Smith, 2 Leach, 856; 1 East, P.C. 183; and R. v. Robinson, 1 Mood. 413, decided on 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 7 (rep.).

Uttering after a Previous Conviction.—Sect. 12 (y). 'Whosoever having been convicted (z), either before or after the passing of this Act, of any such misdemeanor or crime and offence as in any of the last three preceding sections mentioned, or of any felony or high crime and offence against this or any former Act relating to the coin, shall afterwards commit any of the misdemeanors or crimes and offences in any of the said sections mentioned, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . ' (a).

Sect. 13. 'Whosoever shall, with intent to defraud, tender, utter, or put off as or for any of the King's current gold or silver coin, any coin not being such current gold or silver coin, or any medal or piece of metal or mixed metals, resembling in size, figure, and colour the current coin as or for which the same shall be so tendered, uttered, or put off, such coin, medal, or piece of metal or mixed metals so tendered, uttered, or put off being of less value than the current coin as or for which the same shall be so tendered, uttered, or put off, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, with or without hard labour . . . ' (b).

The prisoner was indicted under this section for uttering a medal resembling in size, figure, and colour, a half-sovereign. The medal was made of metal, and of the same diameter as a half-sovereign, and somewhat similar in colour. On the obverse there was the head of Queen Victoria, similar to that on a half-sovereign; but the legend was entirely different from that on the half-sovereign, being 'Victoria, Queen of Great Britain,'

(x) Framed from 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, ss. 7, 8, with the addition of the words in italics. For other punishments, see ante, p. 348. (y) Taken from 2 Will. IV. c. 34, ss. 7, 8: but those sections only applied to offences committed after a conviction for a misdemeanor: but it was expedient to extend the clause to convictions after a previous conviction for felony; for such previous conviction rendered the offender deserving of at least as high a punishment as if he had been previously convicted of any misdemeanor mentioned in any of the three preceding sections, and it sometimes happened that it was easier to prove a previous conviction for felony than for such a misdemeanor; as the former might have taken place in the same county where the subsequent offence was committed, but not the latter. As to the effect of s. 12 see R. v. Lee, 72 J. P. 253.

(b) This section was new law in 1861, and intended to meet cases of uttering coin other than British current coin or medals as and for the current coin of the realm. In order to bring a case within this section, the coin or medal uttered must be of less value than the coin for which it was uttered, and must have been uttered with intent to defraud.

instead of 'Victoria Dei Gratia.' The medal was querled, but the querling was round and not square. The medal was of less value than a half-sovereign. The coin was lost before a full description of it was given, and it was never shewn to the jury. It was objected that 'figure' in the indictment meant the impression on the medal, and that such impression must be similar to the impression on the genuine coin for which it was uttered, and that there was no evidence that the medal resembled the half-sovereign in size, figure, and colour. It was answered that 'figure' meant the general shape and outline of the medal, and that there was evidence for the jury; and the jury having convicted, it was held, on a case reserved, that there was some evidence that the medal, in size, figure, and colour resembled a half-sovereign (c).

Uttering Counterfeit Copper Coin.—Sect. 15. 'Whosoever shall tender, utter, or put off any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current copper coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, or shall have in his custody or possession three or more pieces of false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current copper coin, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, and with intent to utter or put off the same or any of them, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year, with or without hard labour . . . ' (d).

Form of Indictment.—The word 'knowing' in indictments for uttering coin sufficiently applies to the time and place of uttering, and no addition of time or place is necessary. The word 'knowing' refers to the prisoner, and not to the person to whom the coin was uttered, although that person's name immediately precedes the word 'knowing.'

If the names of the persons to whom the coin was uttered can be ascertained, they ought to be mentioned, and laid severally in the indictment: but if they cannot be ascertained, the same rule will apply which prevails in the case of stealing the property of persons unknown (e).

It is sufficient, in an indictment for a felony for uttering counterfeit coin after a previous conviction, to state that the prisoner was in due form of law tried and convicted by a jury (f).

Tracy, of a woman who was indicted at the Old Bailey, 1702, for putting off ten pieces of counterfeit gilt money like guineas, to divers persons unknown; Holt, C.J., said, that the names of the persons ought to be mentioned and laid severally; yet he tried the prisoner, and she was convicted. Probably the names of the persons to whom the money was put off could not be ascertained.

2 Mood. 219. In the latter case the indictment, which was under 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 7, for uttering counterfeit money after a previous conviction, alleged that the prisoner, 'together with one T. P., was in due form of law tried and convicted' by a jury upon an indictment against them, for that they did unlawfully utter a shilling 'to A. W., knowing the same to be false,' and thereupon it was considered that the prisoner should be imprisoned for two years; and that the prisoner afterwards feloniously did utter a half-crown 'to T. H., knowing the same to be false.' The copy of the record of the former trial stated the conviction of the prisoner and the acquittal of T. P. It was objected, 1st. That the

It is no objection that an indictment for felony, for uttering counterfeit coin after a previous conviction, states that the prisoner, together with another person, was tried and convicted; and the record of the former trial shews the conviction of the prisoner and the acquittal of the other person.

Sect. 37. 'Where any person shall have been convicted (g) of any offence against this Act, or any former Act (h) relating to the coin, and shall afterwards be indicted for any offence against this Act committed subsequent to such conviction, it shall be sufficient in any such indictment, after charging such subsequent offence, to state the substance and effect only (omitting the formal part) of the indictment and conviction for the previous offence; . . . (hh) and the proceedings upon any indictment for committing any offence after a previous conviction or convictions shall be as follows; (that is to say), the offender shall, in the first instance, be arraigned upon so much only of the indictment as charges the subsequent offence, and if he plead not guilty, or if the Court order a plea of not guilty to be entered on his behalf (i), the jury shall be charged, in the first instance, to inquire concerning such subsequent offence only; and if they find him guilty, or if on arraignment he plead guilty, he shall then, and not before, be asked whether he had been previously convicted as alleged in the indictment, and if he answer that he had been so previously convicted, the Court may proceed to sentence him accordingly; but if he deny that he had been so previously convicted, or stand mute of malice, or will not answer directly to such question, the jury shall then be charged to inquire concerning such previous conviction or convictions, and in such case it shall not be necessary to swear the jury again, but the oath already taken by them shall for all purposes be deemed to extend to such last-mentioned inquiry: provided that if upon the trial of any person for any such subsequent offence such person shall give evidence of his good character, it shall be lawful for the prosecutor, in indictment was bad for want of an addition of time and place to the allegation of knowledge, which was to be found neither in the recital of the former indictment, nor in the substantive charge on the face of the present indictment; but the learned judge thought that the former indictment was good, being in the words of the statute and after verdict; and that 'knowing' in the present indictment, being a participle in the present tense, must import knowledge at the time of the uttering. 2ndly. That the word 'knowing' did not refer to the prisoner, but to A. W. and T. H.; but Coleridge, J., thought that 'knowing' did refer to the prisoner, as all that was alleged to be done was alleged to be done by him. 3rdly. That the indictment did not state any former conviction, because neither the plea nor the verdict of the jury was recited; but the learned judge thought that the allegation that he had been in due course of law tried and convicted, together with a statement of the judgment, was sufficient. 4thly. That the recital of the former record shewed a conviction of the prisoner and T. P., whereas the record produced shewed that the prisoner alone had been convicted and T. P. acquitted, and therefore there was a variance; the learned judge overruled this objection also, but entertaining some doubt upon the point, he reserved the case for the opinion of the judges, who held the conviction right. Coleridge, J., stated the other points to the judges, that the prisoner might have the benefit of them, if he had been wrong in overruling them.

answer thereto, to give evidence of the conviction of such person for the previous offence or offences, before such verdict of guilty shall be returned, and the jury shall inquire concerning such previous conviction or convictions at the same time that they inquire concerning such subsequent offence' (j).

Where the indictment charged a felonious uttering after a previous conviction, the jury found the prisoner guilty of the uttering but not guilty of the previous conviction, it was held that this was a verdict of not guilty of the felony charged, and that the prisoner could not be convicted of the misdemeanor of uttering upon that indictment (k).

Evidence.—As to evidence of what is a current coin (l), and coin being counterfeit, and of possession, see ante, p. 344.

For the purpose of proving the uttering, &c., to have been done knowingly, it is the practice to receive proof of more than one uttering committed by the party about the same time, though only one uttering be charged in the indictment. This is in conformity with the practice upon indictments for disposing of and putting away forged bank notes, knowing them to be forged (m); upon one of which the counsel for the prisoners, objecting to such evidence, contended that it would not be allowed upon an indictment for uttering bad money; and stated that the proof in such case was always exclusively confined to the particular uttering charged in the indictment. But Thomson, B., said, that he by no means agreed in the conclusion of the prisoners' counsel, that the prosecutor could not give evidence of another uttering on the same day to prove the guilty knowledge. 'Such other uttering,' he observed, 'cannot be punished until it has become the subject of a distinct and separate charge; but it affords strong evidence of the knowledge of the prisoner that the money he uttered was bad. If a man utter a bad shilling, and fifty other bad shillings are found upon him, this would bring him within the description of a common utterer (n): but if the indictment do not contain that charge, yet these circumstances may be given in evidence on any other

(j) Under 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34 (rep.), it was necessary in an indictment for a subsequent offence, to set out at length the previous indictment, &c., and to give in evidence a copy of that indictment, &c. This was found objectionable, and therefore the present enactment provided for a short statement in the indictment, and for a certificate containing the substance and effect of the former indictment, &c.; it provides for the proceedings on the arraignment, and in the same manner as on an indictment for larceny after a previous conviction for felony. The words 'after charging the subsequent offence' were inserted in order to render it absolutely necessary always to charge the subsequent offence or offences first in the indictment, and after so doing to allege the previous conviction or convictions. This was the invariable practice on the Oxford Circuit, and the Select Committee of the Commons were clear that it ought to be universally followed, so that the previous conviction should not be mentioned, even by accident, before a verdict of guilty of the subsequent offence had been delivered. C. S. G. This section is virtually superseded by 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 9, post, Bk. xii. c. iii. For present procedure as to offences after previous convictions, see post, Bk. xii. c. iii.

charge of uttering, to shew that he uttered the money with a knowledge of its being bad' (o). So, upon an indictment for uttering a counterfeit shilling, the fact of five other counterfeit shillings having been found in the prisoner's possession five days afterwards, has been held admissible in order to shew guilty knowledge (p).

In order to prove guilty knowledge, both previous and subsequent utterings of the same and of different kinds of coin are admissible. On an indictment for uttering a counterfeit half-crown on the 12th of December, that uttering was proved, and the uttering of another counterfeit half-crown on the 11th of December, and evidence was admitted of an uttering of a counterfeit shilling on the 4th of January, although it was objected that a subsequent uttering of a different species of counterfeit coin was not admissible to shew guilty knowledge at a prior time; and it was held that this evidence was properly received. In order to shew guilty knowledge, it would not be sufficient merely to prove some other dishonest act; but here the uttering of the bad silver was so connected with the offence charged, as to make the evidence of it admissible, although the coin was of a different denomination; and the difference of the denomination goes to the weight of the evidence, but does not affect its admissibility (q).

On an indictment on 2 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 8, for having in possession counterfeit crowns and half-crowns with intent to utter the same, it appeared that there were found in different pockets of the prisoner's dress four counterfeit crowns, all electro-plated, of the same date and same mould, each wrapped in a separate piece of paper: thirteen counterfeit half-crowns, all electro-plated, of the same date and the same mould, each wrapped in a separate piece of paper; and fourteen counterfeit shillings, all electro-plated, of the same date and the same mould. The prisoner said that they had been given him while gambling, and that he did not know that they were counterfeit: and it was held that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury that he knew that the coin was counterfeit, and intended to utter it (r).

Intent.—The gist of the offence, as now defined, lies in the knowledge that the coin is counterfeit. Except in sect. 13, intent to defraud is not a part of the definition of the said offence, and it is no longer essential to prove that the uttering was done with intent to defraud the party receiving the money, or with intent that that party should pass it as the agent of the utterer. But to warrant a conviction there must be some indication of a dishonest purpose (s) or mens rea (t).

(s) Upon an indictment on 2 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 7 (rep.), against husband and wife for uttering a counterfeit half-crown, it appeared that a woman asked the female prisoner to give her something, as her children were without food, and the male prisoner gave her twopence, and told her that his wife would give her something more, on which she gave the woman the bad half-crown in question, telling her to get what she could for her children: it was held that, although in the statute there are no words with respect to defrauding, yet in the proof it is necessary to go beyond the mere words of the statute, and to shew an intention to defraud some person. There might be cases of a party giving a person a piece of counterfeit money, and at the same time telling the person that it was bad, and yet he would still be liable to be convicted on an indictment like the present, if a case

Evidence of Previous Conviction.—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 37, ‘ . . . and a certificate containing the substance and effect only (omitting the formal part) of the indictment and conviction for the previous offence, purporting to be signed by the Clerk of the Court or other officer having or purporting to have the custody of the records of the Court where the offender was first convicted, or by the deputy of such clerk or officer, shall, upon proof of the identity of the person of the offender, be sufficient evidence of the previous conviction, without proof of the signature or official character or authority of the person appearing to have signed the same, or of his custody or right to the custody of the records of the Court, and for every such certificate a fee of six shillings and eightpence, and no more, shall be demanded or taken . . . ’ (u).

It is clear from the terms of the enactment that the certificate is admissible without further proof if it appears to be in proper form (v).

If the prisoner, whether by himself or his counsel, attempts to prove a good character for honesty, either directly, by calling witnesses, or indirectly, by cross-examining the witnesses for the Crown, the prosecution may give the previous conviction in evidence against the prisoner (w). If, however, a witness for the prosecution were asked by the prisoner’s counsel some question, which has no reference to character, and he happened to say something favourable to the prisoner’s character, the prisoner would not be said to give evidence as to his character, and the previous conviction ought not to be admitted (x).

C. Of Uttering, Tendering, &c., Foreign Counterfeit Coin, &c.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 20, ‘ Whosoever shall tender, utter, or put off any such false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any gold or silver coin of any foreign prince, state, or country (y), knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in falling within the mere words of the statute were sufficient. R. v. Page, 8 C. & P. 122. ‘ As every person is taken to intend the probable consequence of his act, and as the probable consequence of giving a piece of bad money to a beggar is that that beggar will pass it to some one else, and thereby defraud that person; quære, whether this case rests upon satisfactory grounds? In any case a party may not be defrauded by taking base coin, as he may pass it again, but still the probability is that he will be defrauded, and that is sufficient.’ C. S. G. But where on an indictment for uttering counterfeit coin, it appeared that the prisoner had given the coin to a girl with whom he had had connection, Denman, C.J., and Coltman, J., held that if the prisoner gave the coin to the girl under the circumstances proved, knowing it to be counterfeit, he was guilty of the offence charged; that the preceding decision was not in point, as that was a case of charity; but that there were great doubts as to the correctness of that ruling. Anon., 1 Cox, 250. And in R. v. Ion, 2 Den. 484, it was said by Alderson, B., that R. v. Page is overruled, and that ‘ the intent is inferred by law,’ in like manner as ‘ if a forged instrument is put away in order to get money or credit, that amounts to an uttering.’

These cases are very probably misreported, as it is quite clear that no such evidence is required, and the universal practice has been to the contrary. C. S. G.

Sect. 21. 'Whosoever, having been so convicted as in the last preceding section mentioned, shall afterwards commit the like offence of tendering, uttering, or putting off any such false or counterfeit coin as aforesaid, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, [and with or without solitary confinement (a);] and whosoever, having been so convicted of a second offence, shall afterwards commit the like offence of tendering, uttering, or putting off any such false or counterfeit coin as aforesaid, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . SECT. VIII.—OF BUYING, SELLING, RECEIVING, OR PAYING FOR COUNTERFEIT COIN AT A LOWER RATE THAN ITS DENOMINATION IMPORTS.

Gold or Silver Coin.—By sect. 6, 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, or offer to buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King's current gold or silver coin at or for a lower rate or value than the same imports or was apparently intended to import, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . (c); and in any indictment for any such offence as in this section aforesaid it shall be sufficient to allege that the party accused did buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, or did offer to buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off the false or counterfeit coin at or for a lower rate or value than the same imports or was apparently intended to import, without alleging at or for what rate, price, or value the same was bought, sold, received, paid, or put off, or offered to be bought, sold, received, paid, or put off' (d).

(d) Taken from 2 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 6, with the additions and substitutions italicised. The words 'without lawful authority,' &c., were introduced in order to protect officers and others who are authorised to buy or procure false coin in order to detect coiners. In the repealed enactment there was no qualification. The words 'apparently intended to import' are substituted for 'or was coined, or counterfeited for.' The last part of the section renders it unnecessary to allege the sum for which the coin was bought, &c., and consequently Copper Coin.—By sect. 14, ‘Whosoever . . . (e) shall buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, or offer to buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off any false or counterfeit coin resembling or apparently intended to resemble or pass for any of the King’s current copper coin, at or for a lower rate or value than the same imports or was apparently intended to import, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . .’ (f).

The mere vending of the coin was not considered to come within 8 & 9 Will. III. c. 26, s. 6 (rep.), unless it were done at a lower value than the coin imported (g). The mode of stating the lower value in indictments under the present enactments is regulated by the latter part of sect. 13 of the Act of 1861.

If the names of the persons to whom the money was put off can be ascertained, they ought to be laid in the indictment; but if they cannot be ascertained the same rule applies as in stealing the property of persons unknown (h).

SECT. IX.—OF THE MAKING, MENDING, OR HAVING IN POSSESSION ANY INSTRUMENTS FOR COINING.

In R. v. Sutton (2 Str. 1074; cas. temp. Hardw. 370), it was said that the possession of tools for coining with intent to use them was a misdemeanor at common law. But in R. v. Heath (i) this decision was said to be untenable.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 24, ‘Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall knowingly make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any puncheon (j), counter-puncheon, matrix, stamp, die, pattern, or mould (k), in or upon which there shall be whatever the evidence on that point may be, there can be no variance between it and the allegation in the indictment, and all that need be proved is that the coin was bought, &c., at some lower rate or value than it imports. Under 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 7, it was necessary to aver and prove the sum for which the coin was bought, &c. R. v. Joyce, Carr. Supp. 184. R. v. Hedges, 3 C. & P. 410.

(k) Mould was specifically mentioned in one clause of 8 & 9 Will. III. c. 26, s. 1, and was held to fall within the words ‘or other tool or instrument hereinbefore mentioned’ used in a later clause. R. v. Lennard [1772], 1 Leach, 90; 2 W. Bl. 807; 1 East, P.C. 170. Upon the form of the indictment the question was raised, whether the mould which was found in the prisoner’s custody, it having only the resemblance of a shilling inverted, viz., the convex parts of the shilling being concave in the mould, and vice versa, the head or profile being turned the contrary way of the coin, and all the letters of the inscription reversed, was not properly an instrument which would make and impress the resemblance, stamp, &c., rather than an instrument on which the same were made and impressed, as laid in this indictment, the statute seeming to distinguish between such as will made or impressed, or which will make or impress, or which shall be adapted and intended to make or impress, the figure, stamp, or apparent resemblance of both or either of the sides of any of the King's current gold or silver coin, or of any coin of any foreign prince, state, or country (l), or any part or parts (m) of both or either of such sides; or shall make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or shall buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any edger, edging or other tool, collar (n), instrument, or engine adapted and intended for the marking of coin round the edges with letters, grainings, or other marks or figures apparently resembling those on the edges of any such coin as in this section aforesaid, knowing the same to be so adapted and intended as aforesaid; or shall make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or shall buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any press for coinage (o), or any cutting engine for cutting, by force of a screw or of any other contrivance, round blanks out of gold, silver, or other metal or mixture of metals, or any other machine, knowing such press to be a press for coinage, or knowing such engine or machine to have been used, or to be intended to be used, for or in order to the false making or counterfeiting of any such coin as in this section aforesaid, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . ' (p).

Conveying Tools or Monies out of the Mint without Authority.—Sect.

25. 'Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall knowingly convey out of any of His Majesty's mints any puncheon, counter-puncheon, matrix, stamp, die, pattern, mould, edger, edging or other tool, collar, instrument, press, or engine used or employed in or about the coining of coin, or any useful part of any of the several matters aforesaid, or any coin, bullion, metal, or mixture of metals, shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . make and impress the similitude, &c., as the matrix, die, and mould; and such on which the same is made and impressed, as a puncheon, or counter-puncheon, or pattern. But a great majority of the judges were of opinion that this evidence sufficiently maintained the indictment; because the stamp of the current coin was certainly impressed on the mould in order to form the cavities thereof. They agreed, however, that the indictment would have been more accurate had it charged that 'he had in his custody a mould that would make and impress the similitude,' &c., and in this opinion some, who otherwise doubted, acquiesced. In R. v. Macmillan, 1 Cox, 41, Maule, J., seems to have ruled that a mould must be something with which a coin can be made, and to have directed an acquittal where a mould having a perfect impression of one side of a shilling, had no channel through which the metal could run.

(l) These words provide for foreign coin not dealt with by 8 & 9 Will. III. c. 20. R. v. Bell, 1 East, P.C. 169; Fost. 430.

(m) These words, which were in 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 10, were held to apply to cases where several moulds were used to make one side of a coin. R. v. Richmond, 1 C. & K. 240, Rolfe, B. In R. v. Macmillan, 1 Cox, 41, Maule, J., held that the words 'part or parts' refer to the impression, and not to the mould itself.

Making or having Tools for Coining Copper.—Sect. 14. ‘ . . . Whosoever, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the party accused), shall knowingly make or mend, or begin or proceed to make or mend, or buy or sell, or have in his custody or possession, any instrument, tool, or engine adapted and intended for the counterfeiting any of the King’s current copper coin . . . shall, in England and Ireland, be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . .’ (r).

Lawful Authority or Excuse.—It has been decided upon sect. 24 that the word ‘excuse’ includes authority, and that it is unnecessary to allege or prove any intent. The felony is knowingly to have possession of a die, and the guilty knowledge required is that of being in possession of the die, contrary to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, that is, without lawful authority or excuse. A guilty intention to use the dies is not necessary (s).

Where two galvanic batteries were found in the prisoner’s house, with white metal and other things plainly indicating that they had been used for coining, and it was proved that counterfeit coin is electro-plated before it is put in circulation, and that that is generally done by the aid of galvanic batteries, it was held that the batteries were machines within the meaning of this section (t).

Innocent Agent.—Where a die calculated to make shillings is made by an innocent agent, the party procuring him to make such die is the principal. The prisoner was indicted under 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 10 (repealed and replaced by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 24), for feloniously making a die which would impress the resemblance of the obverse side of a shilling. The prisoner applied to a die-sinker to sink four dies for counters for two whist clubs, stating that it was their practice to play with counters with one side resembling coins. The dies were to be obverse in the one case head of Queen Victoria, as in the shilling; in the other the shilling as in coin, with wreath, &c. Reverses the names of the clubs. The die-sinker was directed to execute the prisoner’s order. The prisoner afterwards desired to have the two obverses finished first, and they were so. When they were finished, they formed a die for the coining of a shilling. For the prisoner, it was objected that he could not be convicted, as he had not himself done anything in the making of the die, and that he was not answerable in this form of charge for the act of the die-sinker; that the die-sinker having acted under the instructions of the Mint, no felony whatever had been committed, and that the prisoner should have been indicted for a misdemeanor in inciting the die-sinker to commit a felony. But, upon a case reserved, all the judges present (except Cresswell) thought the die-sinker an innocent agent, and held the conviction good (u).

iron and steel, a witness who saw the die said it was made of iron ; another witness, who had not seen it, said that dies were usually made of steel, and that iron dies would not stand. It was held that this evidence would support the indictment, for it was immaterial to the offence of what the die was made, and proof of a die either of iron or steel, or both, would satisfy charge (v).

The degree of resemblance to the real coin which the tools or instrument must be capable of impressing in order to bring the case within sect. 24, must be governed by considerations similar to those which have been stated with respect to the counterfeit coin itself (w). Whether the instrument in question be adapted and intended to impress the figure, stamp, resemblance, or similitude of the coin current is a question for the jury ; and it is clear, that the offence is not confined to 'an exact imitation of the original and proper effigies of the coin' (x).

An indictment alleged in one count that a prisoner feloniously had in his possession a mould 'upon which was impressed the figure and apparent resemblance of one of the sides (that is to say) the obverse side of the King's current coin called a shilling,' and in another count the substituted word 'reverse' for 'obverse.' The moulds when produced appeared not to have a complete impression of the obverse and reverse sides of a shilling, but only the outside rim, and a slight portion of the other parts of the impression ; the entire impressions, however, appeared to have been upon them at one time, but part had been obliterated. It was held, that if the jury believed that no more than part of the impression was impressed upon the moulds while the prisoner was in possession of them, he ought to be acquitted (y). But where an indictment charged that the prisoner made a mould, which was intended to impress the resemblance of the obverse side of a shilling, it was held sufficient to prove that the prisoner made a mould, which would make a part of the impression. One count charged the prisoner with making a mould, 'which said mould was intended to make and impress the figure and apparent resemblance' of the obverse side, and another the reverse side, of a shilling ; the evidence being the same as in the former case ; it was held, that the term 'intended' did not mean in a state to make an entire impression, and therefore if the prisoner had only begun to make, the intention to make the whole might be inferred, though only part was actually made, and consequently that the evidence was sufficient (z).

An indictment charging that the prisoner had in his possession a mould 'upon which was made and impressed the figure' of one of the sides of a coin was held bad for not shewing that the figure was on the mould at the time when the prisoner had it in his possession. The words 'then and there' should be introduced before the word 'made' (a).

W. and two other men and two women were indicted for having in their possession a mould impressed with one side of a half-crown. W. had occupied a house for a month, and the police one night went to the house and found the other prisoners there. The men attacked the police, whilst the women snatched up something which they threw into the fire. The police preserved part of this, which proved to be fragments of a plaster of Paris mould of a half-crown, parts of which were still wet. A quantity of plaster of Paris was found in a cupboard up stairs, with several bottles of liquid. In a cupboard down stairs an iron ladle, such as might have been used for melting metal, was found; on the hearth in one of the rooms up stairs was found a small portion of white metal and some fragments of plaster of Paris moulds. Thirteen days before W. had passed a bad half-crown; but there was no evidence to shew that it was made in the mould found in the house. The jury found that W. knew that the mould was in the house. It was held that W. was rightly convicted, as the mould was found in the house of which he was the master, and that the evidence of the uttering of the half-crown by him was rightly admitted to establish the scienter (b).

On an indictment against husband, wife, and boy aged ten years, for having in possession a mould on which was impressed the obverse side of a shilling, it appeared that the boy was apprehended whilst passing a counterfeit half-crown, and on the officer going to the house where he said he resided the husband was found in an upper room. In the lower room the mould and various coining implements were found, and whilst the officer was searching the wife came in, and soon afterwards broke up a mould used in casting counterfeit shillings; on her counterfeit money was found, but none on her husband. Talfourd, J., held that as the husband occupied the room in which the mould was found, prima facie he must be presumed to be in possession of what the room contained; but that presumption might be rebutted, and the jury must consider all the circumstances, and see whether they satisfied them that the trade was carried on there with his sanction. If they were satisfied that the husband was in possession of the mould, they ought to acquit the wife, as she could not in law be said to have any possession separate from her husband; but if they thought that the criminality was on her part alone, and that he was entirely guiltless of any participation in her conduct, she might be convicted. If they thought she broke the mould to screen him from detection, that would not affect the case. Either husband or wife might be convicted on this evidence, but not both. As to the boy, it would be going too far to say that he was a joint possessor with either of his parents (c).

The counterfeiting of foreign coin was then a felony under 37 Geo. III. c. 126, s. 2, repealed and now represented by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 18, ante, p. 352.

Procuring Dies with Intent to Counterfeit Foreign Coin.—An indictment (d) contained one count charging the prisoner with unlawfully causing to be made two dies, one of the obverse side, the other of the reverse side of a silver half-dollar of Peru, with intent feloniously to make counterfeit Peruvian half-dollars, another count charging him with attempting feloniously to coin by making the dies, with intent to use them in coining such counterfeit coins. From the evidence it appeared that the prisoner, without any authority or licence so to do, caused to be made by one Jackson, a die-sinker (who, though he executed the order, gave notice to the police, and committed no offence against the law), the necessary dies for making a counterfeit dollar of Peru. The dies, though suitable and necessary for making such counterfeit coin, could not alone produce it; a press, copper blanks, galvanic battery, and a preparation of silver being also necessary for that purpose. The prisoner had procured galvanic batteries, and had been in negotiation for the purchase of a press and copper blanks for the aforesaid purpose; but he had not actually procured either press, blanks, or preparation of silver. There was no doubt that the prisoner intended to use the whole apparatus when procured in making counterfeit Peruvian dollars, and the only doubt was whether he intended to coin in Peru only, or in this country also; and it was contended that, if he only intended to make the coin in Peru, no offence had been committed; and even if he did intend to coin in this country, that intention, though coupled with the act of causing the dies to be made in pursuance of such intention, fell short of an attempt to commit a felony. The jury found that the intention of the prisoner was to cause to be made and procure the dies and other apparatus in order therewith to coin counterfeit Peruvian half-dollars, and to make a few only of the counterfeit coin in England by way of trying whether the apparatus would answer before sending it out to Peru, to be there used in making the counterfeit coin, and convicted the prisoner; and upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right. Jervis, C.J., said: 'This is not an indictment for an attempt to commit statutable offence; as was the case in R. v. Williams (e), where the charge was an attempt to administer poison. Here there is no direct attempt to coin, but the indictment is founded on a criminal intent coupled with an act immediately connected with the offence. . . . Nobody can doubt that the prisoner was in possession of machinery necessarily connected with the offence, for the express purpose of committing it, and which was obtained, and could be obtained, for no other purpose.' And Wightman, J., said: 'No doubt the act was done with intent to commit a felony, and was sufficient to support such an indictment as the present. It is an act immediately connected with the offence, and the prisoner could have no other object than to commit the offence' (f).

(f) R. v. Roberts, Dears. 539, Jervis, C.J., Parke, B., Wightman, Cresswell, and Wilkes, J.J. The Court seem to have been clear that making a few specimens to ascertain whether they would answer the purpose would have been a felony within the statute; and that even making a few specimens to put in a cabinet would also be within the statute. And see R. v. Harvey, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 284, ante, p. 367.

When a person exhibits to another bank notes representing them as counterfeit, when in fact they are not so, the offer to purchase such notes cannot be an offence under the Act, as the prisoner was offering to purchase that which the party had to sell, which were not counterfeit tokens of value. Per MacMahon, J., R. v. Attwood (1891), 20 Ont. R. 574, 581.

In the last named case, the defendant was prosecuted for offering to purchase bank notes which were shewn to him as counterfeit, but were in fact genuine bank notes unsigned.

Doubt was also expressed in the Attwood Case as to whether the section applies to counterfeit tokens not in esse, MacMahon, J., saying that it may be that the clause of the statute would require to be amended in order to reach a person offering to purchase such.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE REVENUE LAWS

A.—CUSTOMS.

CONSPIRACY to defraud the Crown of customs duties is a misdemeanor indictable at common law (a).

There has been much legislation passed from time to time in order to prevent smuggling (b) and other acts tending to defeat the due collection of certain duties, which gave to revenue officers extraordinary powers and protections, and punished persons endeavouring to resist or evade the Customs law (c).

The earlier Acts have been superseded and their substance re-enacted in the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36). That Act contains much relating to the forfeiture of vessels engaged in illegal traffic, and of uncustomed goods, which does not come within the scope of this treatise. But it is necessary to notice the enactments relating to the right to seize vessels suspected of being employed for smuggling and to search for and seize uncustomed goods, and also the indictable offences created by the statute. The Act applies to the United Kingdom, to the Isle of Man (sect. 277), and to the Channel Islands (sect. 289).

By sect. 151, 'The Customs Acts shall extend to and be of full force and effect in the several British possessions abroad, except where otherwise expressly provided for by the said Acts, or limited by express reference to the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, and except also as to any such possessions as shall by local Act or ordinance have provided, or may hereafter, with the sanction and approbation of His Majesty, make entire provision for the management and regulation of the customs of any such possession, or make in like manner express provisions in lieu or variation of any of the clauses of the said Act (sic), for the purposes of such possession' (d).

False Declarations.—By sect. 168, 'If any person shall in any matter relating to the Customs or under the control or management of the (c) This legislation was cumulative upon, or alternative to, the common law remedies by indictment. See the precedents of indictments for misdemeanors, in assaulting and obstructing officers of excise and customs, acting in the due execution of their offices. 4 Wentw. 385 et seq. 2 Chit. Cr. L. 127 et seq. And see R. v. Brady, 1 B. & P. 187, where it was admitted that the offence charged was indictable at common law.

(d) Laws, by-laws, and usages, &c., of a British possession contrary to the Acts, are declared void (s. 161).

Commissioners of Customs, make and subscribe, or cause to be made and subscribed, any false declaration, or make or sign any declaration certificate or other instrument required to be verified by signature only, the same being false in any particular, or if any person shall make or sign any declaration made for the consideration of the Commissioners of Customs on any application presented to them, the same being untrue in any particular, or if any person required by this or any other Act relating to the Customs to answer questions put to him by the officers of Customs shall not truly answer such questions, or if any person shall counterfeit falsify or wilfully use when counterfeited or falsified, any document required by this or any Act relating to the Customs or by or under the directions of the Commissioners of Customs, or any instrument used in the transaction of any business or matter relating to the Customs, or shall alter any document or instrument after the same has been officially issued, or counterfeit the seal signature initials or other mark of or used by any officer of the Customs for the verification of any such document or instrument, or for the security of goods, or any other purpose in the conduct of business relating to the Customs or under the control or management of the Commissioners of Customs or their officers, every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit the penalty of one hundred pounds' (e).

Smuggling.—By sect. 179, 'If any ship or boat shall be found or discovered to have been within any port bay harbour river or creek of the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, or within three leagues of the coast thereof if belonging wholly or in part to British subjects, or having half the persons on board subjects of His Majesty, or within one league if not British, have false bulk heads false bows double sides or bottom, or any secret or disguised place adapted for concealing goods, or any hole tube pipe or device adapted for running goods, or having on board or in any manner attached thereto, or having had on board or in any manner attached thereto, or conveying or having conveyed in any manner any spirits tobacco snuff or packages of any size and character in which they are prohibited to be imported into the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, or any spirits or tobacco or snuff imported contrary to the Customs Acts, or any tobacco stalks; tobacco stalk flour, or snuff work, or which (sic) shall be found or discovered to have been within three leagues of any part of the coast of the United Kingdom from which any part of the lading of such ship or boat shall be or have been thrown overboard, or on board which any goods shall be or have been staved or destroyed to prevent seizure,' the ship, boat, spirits, &c., shall be forfeited (f), and 'every person who shall be found or discovered to have been on board any ship or boat liable to forfeiture as aforesaid, within three leagues of the coast if a British subject, and within one league if a foreigner (g), or on board any vessel in His Majesty's service, or on board

(e) As to recovery of penalties, see 42 & 43 Vict. c. 21, s. 11, post, p. 383.

(f) By 53 & 54 Vict. c. 56, s. 1, ships or boats of 250 tons burden and upwards are excepted from forfeiture, and by ss. 2, 3, provisions are made for dealing with larger vessels by fining a responsible officer of the vessel, or in serious cases of condemning the vessel in a sum not exceeding £500. The ship may be detained till the fines are paid or secured.

any foreign post office packet employed in carrying mails between any foreign country and the United Kingdom having on board any spirits or tobacco in such packages as aforesaid or any tobacco stalks, tobacco stalk flour or snuff work, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding £100; and every such person may be detained and taken before any justice, to be dealt with as hereinafter directed: Provided, that no person shall be detained whilst actually on board any vessel in the service of a foreign state or country' (h). 'And provided also that no person shall be liable to conviction under this section unless there shall be reasonable cause to believe that such person was concerned in or privy to the illegal act or thing proved to have been committed' (i).

Sect. 180 provides for the forfeiture of any ships or boats belonging wholly or in part to His Majesty's subjects or having half the persons on board His Majesty's subjects if they do not bring to on signal by a vessel or boat in His Majesty's service or in the service of the revenue and on chase throw overboard stave or destroy any part of the lading to prevent seizure. All persons escaping from such ship or boat during chase are to be deemed subjects of His Majesty unless the contrary is proved.

Search and Seizure of Smuggling Vessels, &c.—By sect. 181, 'If any ship or boat liable to seizure or examination under the Customs Acts shall not bring to when required so to do, the master of such ship or boat shall forfeit the sum of £20; and on being chased by any vessel or boat in His Majesty's navy having the proper pendant and ensign of His Majesty's ships hoisted, or by any vessel or boat duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, having a proper pendant and ensign hoisted, it shall be lawful for the captain, master (see sect. 284), or other person having the charge or command of such vessel or boat in His Majesty's navy, or employed as aforesaid (first causing a gun to be fired as a signal), to fire at or into such ship or boat, and such captain, master, or other person acting in his aid or by his direction shall be and is hereby indemnified and discharged from any indictment penalty action or other proceeding for so doing.'

By sect. 182, 'Any officer of Customs or other person duly employed for the prevention of smuggling may go on board any ship or boat which shall be within the limits of any port of the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, and rummage and search the cabin and all other parts of such ship or boat for prohibited or uncustomed goods, and remain on board such ship or boat so long as she shall continue within the limits of such port.'

By sect. 12 of the Customs, &c., Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12) (j), 'Any officer of Customs or other persons duly employed in the prevention of smuggling may search any person on board any ship or boat within the limits of any port in the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, or any person who shall have landed from any ship or boat, provided such officer or other person duly employed as aforesaid shall have good reason to suppose that such person is carrying or has any uncustomed or prohibited goods about his person.

A person shall be guilty of an offence—

1. If he staves breaks or destroys any goods to prevent the seizure thereof by an officer of Customs or other person authorised to seize the same.
 2. If he rescues or staves breaks or destroys to prevent the securing thereof any goods seized by an officer of Customs or any other person authorised to seize the same.
 3. If he rescues any person apprehended for any offence punishable by fine or imprisonment under the Customs Acts.
 4. If he prevents the apprehension of any such person.

 6. If he attempts or endeavours to commit, or aids, abets, or assists in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in this section.
- And a person so offending, shall, for each offence, forfeit a penalty not exceeding £100 (k), and he may either be detained or proceeded against by information and summons.

By sect. 185 of the Act of 1876, 'Before any person shall be searched he may require to be taken with all reasonable despatch before a justice, or before the collector or other superior officer of Customs, who shall, if he see no reasonable cause for search, discharge such person, but if otherwise, direct that he be searched, and if a female she shall not be searched by any other than a female; but if any officer shall without reasonable ground cause any person to be searched, such officer shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding ten pounds. If any passenger or other person on board any such ship or boat, or who may have landed from any such ship or boat, shall, upon being questioned by any officer of Customs or other person duly employed for the prevention of smuggling whether he has any foreign goods upon his person or in his possession or in his baggage, deny the same, and any such goods shall after such denial be discovered to be or to have been upon his person or in his possession or in his baggage, such goods shall be forfeited, and such person shall forfeit one hundred pounds, or treble the value of such goods, at the election of the Commissioners of Customs.'

Prohibited and Restricted Goods.—Sec. 186. 'Every person who shall import or bring, or be concerned in importing or bringing into the United Kingdom any prohibited goods or any goods the importation of which is restricted (l), contrary to such prohibition or restriction,

Assembling for Smuggling, and Use of Offensive Weapons.—By the Customs Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 21), s. 10 (n), 'All persons to the number of three or more who shall assemble for the purpose of unshipping, landing, running, carrying, concealing, or having so assembled shall unship, land, run, carry, convey, or conceal any spirits, tobacco, or any prohibited, restricted, or uncustomed goods, shall each forfeit a penalty not exceeding £500 nor less than £100.'

Vict. c. 42), extended to the separation of dutiable goods from other matter, where the dutiable goods have been taken to a warehouse as unfit for consumption, by reason of their being mixed with any other matter.

(n) Substituted by 42 & 43 Vict. c. 21, s. 14 and sched. for s. 188 of the Act of 1876.

procure or hire or shall depute or authorise any other person to procure or hire, any person or persons to assemble for the purpose of being concerned in the landing or unshipping or carrying conveying or concealing any goods which are prohibited to be imported, or the duties for which have not been paid or secured, shall be imprisoned for any term not exceeding twelve months; and if any person engaged in the commission of any of the above offences be armed with firearms or other offensive weapons, or whether so armed or not be disguised in any way, or being so armed or disguised, shall be found with any goods liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts, within five miles of the seacoast or of any tidal river, shall be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding three years' (o).

Assembling.—In a case under 19 Geo. II. c. 34 (rep.), it was held that the assembling must be deliberate, and for the purpose of committing the offence described in the statute. So that where a set of drunken men came from an alehouse, and hastily set themselves to carry away some Geneva which had been seized by the excise officers, it was thought very questionable whether the object which the Legislature had in view could be extended to such a case; and the Court said, that the words of the statute manifestly alluded to the circumstance of great multitudes of persons coming down upon the beach of the sea for the purpose of escorting uncustomed goods to the places designed for their reception (p).

Offensive Weapons.—The term 'weapon' would seem to include any instrument of metal or wood, or any club, stone, or other thing which is had for the purpose of effecting an injury on the person, according to the doctrine of the Roman law, Teli appellatione et ferrum, et fustis, et lapis, et denique omne quod nocendi causa habetur, significatur (q).

It was held that to bring offenders within the penalties of 19 Geo. II. c. 34 (rep.), for offences committed by persons, to the number of three or more, armed with firearms, or other offensive weapons, it was necessary that the offenders should be armed with offensive (r) weapons. It seems to have been held that a person catching up a hatchet accidentally, during the hurry and heat of an affray, was not armed with an offensive weapon

(o) The intention of these two sections probably is that three or more persons assembling are to be liable to a penalty, and persons procuring them to assemble are to be liable to twelve months' imprisonment; but if persons assemble armed, or procure others to assemble armed, they are to be liable to three years' imprisonment. The sections are difficult to construe. See Stephen's Digest (6th ed.), art. 81. The term of three years does not seem to have been altered by 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, p. 212. In R. v. Dean, 12 M. & W. 39, two persons were separately convicted of unshipping goods against 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 53, s. 44, by which 'every person concerned in the unshipping of goods, the duties of which have not been paid, was liable to forfeit either the treble value thereof, or to a penalty of £100, and it was held that each was liable to the penalties imposed by the clause. Alderson, B., said (p. 44): 'We must look at the statute to see whether it was intended that every person offending should be punished, or merely that every offence should be punished. The question is whether an offence that is committed by several persons is to be visited by a penalty.'

(p) R. v. Hutchinson, 1 Leach, 343. The Court offered the Attorney-General a special verdict upon this case: but he declined to take it, and the prisoners were acquitted. This construction of the statute as to the assembling being deliberate, and for the purpose of committing the offence, is stated to have been adopted by Willes, J., and Hotham, B., in R. v. Spice, and by Heath, J., in R. v. Gray (both in 1785). 1 Leach, 343, note (a).

within the meaning of that Act (s) ; and that large sticks about three feet long, with large knobs at the end, with several prongs, the natural growth of the stick, arising out of them, were not offensive weapons ; and that, from the preamble of that Act, the weapons must be such as the law calls dangerous (t). But in a subsequent case, the Court said, that although it was difficult to say what should or should not be called an offensive weapon, it would be going a great deal too far to say that nothing but guns, pistols, daggers, and instruments of war, should be so considered ; and that bludgeons properly so called, clubs, and anything that was not in common use for any other purpose but a weapon, were clearly offensive weapons within the meaning of the Legislature (u). Upon 9 Geo. II. c. 35, s. 10 (rep.), where the same words, ‘armed with firearms, or other offensive arms or weapons,’ occurred, it was held that a person armed only with a common whip was not within the meaning of the Act ; though he aided and assisted other persons who were armed with firearms and weapons which were clearly offensive (v). But the correct rule seems to be that laid down by Lord Mansfield in a case under 19 Geo. II. c. 34 (rep.), viz., that where a person was assembled together with others who were armed, and was active, it was not necessary that such individual should be armed (w).

Where a number of persons were assembled for the purpose of landing smuggled goods, and they were, as is usual on such occasions, divided into two different parties, one called the company, who had bats in their hands for the purpose of carrying tubs of spirits (which bats were hop-poles about seven feet in length), and the other, called the protecting party, who were armed with muskets ; and the prisoner was one of the company, and carried a bat, but he did not strike any one with it, but some of the men with bats struck some of the preventive men ; as the bats might be used for offensive purposes, it was left to the jury to say whether the bats were offensive weapons or not (x).

Upon 7 Geo. II. c. 21 (rep.), by which any person who should, with an offensive weapon or instrument, assault with intent to rob, was made guilty of felony, it was decided that the words, ‘offensive weapon or instrument,’ would apply to a stick, though not of extraordinary size, and though it might in general have been used as a walking-stick. An indictment was for assaulting with an offensive weapon, viz., a stick, with intent to rob ; and it appeared that the stick was like a common walking-stick, about a yard long, and not very thick, but that the prisoner, when he came up to the prosecutor, struck him violently on the head with it, so as to cut his head and make it bleed ; and two of the prisoner’s comrades afterwards came up and beat the prosecutor on the head with similar sticks. Holroyd, J., told the jury, that as the prisoner had used the stick as a weapon of offence, he thought it ought to be considered as an offensive weapon ; and the jury having convicted the prisoner, the judges agreed with Holroyd, J., and held the conviction right (y). And in a case on the Night Poaching Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 69), s. 9, it was held to be a question for the jury whether the prisoner had taken out a stick, large enough to be called a bludgeon, which he, being lame, was in the habit of using as a crutch, with intent to use it as an offensive weapon, or merely for the purpose to which he usually applied it (z). From a case upon the same repealed statute (7 Geo. II. c. 21), where the indictment was for assaulting with a certain offensive weapon called a wooden staff, and the evidence proved a violent blow with a great stone, as it was held that the conviction of the prisoner was proper, it appears to follow that both a wooden staff and a great stone were considered as offensive weapons within the meaning of that statute (a).

Signalling in Aid of Smugglers.—By sect. 190 of the Act of 1876, ‘No person shall, after sunset or before sunrise, between the twenty-first day of September and the first day of April, or after the hour of eight in the evening and before the hour of six in the morning at any other time of the year, make, aid, or assist in making any signal in or on board or from any ship or boat, or on or from any part of the coast or shore of the United Kingdom, or within six miles of any part of such coast or shore, for the purpose of giving notice to any person on board any smuggling ship or boat, whether any person so on board of such ship or boat be or not within distance to notice any such signal; and if any person, contrary to the Customs Acts, shall make or cause to be made, or aid or assist in making, any such signal, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be stopped arrested detained and conveyed before any justice, who, if he see cause, shall commit the offender to the next county gaol, there to remain until delivered by due course of law; and it shall not be necessary to prove on any indictment or information in such case that any ship or boat was actually on the coast; and the offender, being duly convicted, shall, by order of the Court before whom he shall be convicted, either forfeit the penalty of one hundred pounds, or, at the discretion of such Court, be committed to a gaol or house of correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any term not exceeding one year’ (b).

The ground upon which the judges held in this case, that the evidence was sufficient to maintain the charge in the indictment, and the weapon proved, produce the same sort of mischief, viz., by blows and bruises; and that the description would have been sufficient in an indictment for murder.

(b) In R. v. Brown, M. & M. 163, where an indictment upon 6 Geo. IV. c. 108, s. 52 (rep.), which was similar to s. 190 of the Act of 1876, stated that the defendants between sunset on March 8 and sunrise on March 9, that is to say, on the morning of the said March 9, about three o'clock, did make certain lights, &c. It was proved that the lights were made on the morning of March 9, and it was objected that the indictment did not state the offence to have been committed between Sept. 21 and April 1, and that the allegation that the offence was committed on March 9 was not sufficient, because the prosecutor was not bound to the day laid, but might prove the offence to have taken place on any other day; that the time was of the essence of the offence, and therefore it ought to have formed a distinct and substantive averment in the words of the Act; but it was held that the day having been proved as laid, the objection could only properly be made in arrest of judgment, and even then it was no valid objection; for judicial notice must be taken that the day averred in the indictment is, in fact, within the period mentioned in the statute, and therefore the indictment was good. Littledale, J., after consulting Gaselee, J., and see R. v. Martin, ante, p. 357.

By sect. 191, 'If any person be charged with having made or caused to be made, or for aiding or assisting in making, any such signal as aforesaid, the burden of proof that such signal so charged as having been made with intent and for the purpose of giving such notice as aforesaid was not made with such intent and for such purpose shall be upon the defendant against whom such charge is made.'

By sect. 192, 'Any person whatsoever may prevent any signal being made as aforesaid, and may go upon any lands for that purpose, without being liable to any indictment suit or action for the same.'

Shooting at Preventive Vessels.—By sect. 193, 'If any person shall maliciously shoot at any vessel or boat belonging to His Majesty's navy, or in the service of the revenue, or shall maliciously shoot at, maim, or wound any officer of the army navy marines or coastguard, being duly employed in the prevention of smuggling and on full pay, or any officer of customs or excise, or any person acting in his aid or assistance, or duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, in the execution of his office or duty, every person so offending, and every person aiding abetting or assisting therein, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to penal servitude for any term not less than five years (c), or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three years' (d).

Upon the similar section in 52 Geo. III. c. 143, s. 11 (rep.) (e), it was held that where a custom-house vessel had chased a smuggler and fired into her without hoisting the pendant and ensign then required (by 56 Geo. III. c. 104, s. 8), the returning such fire was not malicious. The indictment was for shooting at a vessel in the service of the customs on the high seas within one hundred leagues of the coast of Great Britain; and also for maliciously shooting at an officer of the customs, &c. The revenue vessel had chased a smuggler within the limits; the smuggler did not bring to upon being chased and a signal-gun fired; whereupon the revenue vessel fired at the smuggler, and the smuggler returned the fire, and they had a regular engagement, in which one of the custom-house officers was severely wounded. In order to prove the right to fire at the smuggler, reference was made to 56 Geo. III. c. 104, s. 8, which, in the case of ships employed by the Treasury, Admiralty, Customs, or Excise to prevent smuggling, gave the power of firing at the smuggler, if the ship had a pendant and ensign hoisted of such description as His Majesty by any order in council, or by royal proclamation under the Great Seal, should direct. There had been no proclamation, nor was any order in council proved; though, after the trial, an order in council was discovered, which required certain particulars in the pendant and ensign which this ship's pendant and ensign had not. Upon a case reserved, eleven judges (Best, J., being absent) were clear that, as the custom-house vessel had not complied with what was required to make her shooting legal, the smuggler's firing was not in law malicious (f).

By sect. 196, officers of the army, navy, marines, or coastguard on full pay and duly employed for the prevention of smuggling and officers of customs and any person acting in their aid, when on duty, may patrol and pass freely along and over the coasts, and railways, and creeks and inlets of the sea, except in gardens and pleasure grounds.

Detention of Crew of Smugglers.—By sect. 198, 'Where any person, being part of the crew of any ship in His Majesty's employment or service, shall have been detained under the Customs Acts, such person, upon notice thereof to the commanding officer of the ship, shall be placed in security by such commanding officer on board such ship or vessel, until required to be brought before a justice to be dealt with according to law, for which purpose such commanding officer shall deliver him to the detaining officer.'

By sect. 199, 'If any person liable to be detained under the Customs Acts shall not be detained at the time of committing the offence, or being detained shall escape, he may afterwards be detained at any place in the United Kingdom within three years from the time such offence was committed, and if detained may be taken before any justice to be dealt with as if he had been detained at the time of committing such offence, or if not so detained may be proceeded against by information and summons.'

Taking up Floating Spirits.—By sect. 200, 'If any person not being an officer of the navy, customs, or excise shall intermeddle with or take up any spirits being in casks of less content than nine (g) gallons found floating upon or sunk in the sea, such spirits shall be forfeited, together with any vessel or boat in which they may be found; but if any person shall give information to any such officer so that seizure of such spirits may be made, he shall be entitled to such reward as the Commissioners of Customs may direct.'

Offer of Prohibited Goods.—By sect. 201, 'If any person shall offer for sale any goods under pretence that the same are prohibited, or have been unshipped and run ashore without payment of duties, all such goods (although not liable to any duties or prohibited) shall be forfeited, and every person so offering the same for sale shall forfeit treble the value of such goods.'

Seizure of Vessels or Vehicles in Use for Smuggling.—By sect. 202, 'All ships boats carriages, or other conveyances, together with all horses and other animals and things made use of in the importation landing removal or conveyance of any uncustomed prohibited restricted or other goods liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts shall be forfeited, and all ships boats goods carriages or other conveyances, together with

Stopping and Searching Vehicles.—Sect. 203. 'Any officers of customs excise coastguard constabulary police or other person duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, may upon reasonable suspicion or probable cause stop and examine any cart waggon or other conveyance, to ascertain whether any smuggled goods are contained therein; and if none shall be found the officer or other person shall not on account of such stoppage and examination be liable to any prosecution or action at law on account thereof; and any person driving or conducting such cart, waggon, or other conveyance refusing to stop or allow such examination when required in the King's name, shall forfeit not less than twenty nor more than one hundred pounds.'

Writs of Assistance.—Sect. 204. 'All writs of assistance issued from the Court of Exchequer or other proper Court (h) shall continue in force during the reign for which they were granted and for six months afterwards, and any officer of customs, or person acting under the direction of the Commissioners of Customs, having such writ of assistance or any warrant issued by a justice of the peace may, in the daytime, enter into and search (i) any house shop cellar warehouse room or other place, and in case of resistance, break open doors chests trunks and other packages, and seize and bring away any uncustomed or prohibited goods, and put and secure the same in the King's warehouse; and may take with him any constable or police officer, who may act as well without as within the limits of the district or place for which he shall have been sworn or appointed.'

Stoppage and Seizure of Goods.—By sect. 206, ‘ If any such goods liable to duties of customs, or prohibited to be imported, or in any way restricted, shall be stopped or taken by any police officer on suspicion that the same had been feloniously stolen, he may carry the same to the police office to which the offender if detained is taken, there to remain until and in order to be produced at the trial of such offender, and in such case the officer is required to give notice in writing to the Commissioners of Customs of such stoppage or detention, with the particulars of the goods, but immediately after such stoppage, if the offender be not detained, or if detained immediately after the trial of such offender, such officer shall convey to and deposit the goods in the nearest customs warehouse, to be proceeded against according to law ; and if any police officer so detaining any such goods shall neglect to convey the same to such warehouse, or to give the notice hereinbefore prescribed, he shall forfeit a sum not exceeding twenty pounds.’

By sect. 207, ‘ Whenever any seizure shall be made, unless in the possession or in the presence of the offender, master, or owner as forfeited under the Customs Acts or under any Act by which customs officers are empowered to make seizures, the seizing officer shall give notice in writing of such seizure and of the grounds thereof to the master or owner of the things seized, if known, either by delivering the same to him personally or by letter addressed to him and transmitted by post to or delivered at his last known place of abode or business, if known ; and all seizures made under the Customs Acts or under any Act by which customs officers are empowered to make seizures shall be deemed and taken to be condemned, and may be sold or otherwise disposed of in such manner as the Commissioners of Customs may direct, unless the person from whom such seizure shall have been made, or the master or owner thereof, or some person authorised by him, shall, within one calendar month from the day of seizure, give notice in writing, if in London, to the person seizing the same, or to the secretary or solicitor for the customs, and if elsewhere, to the person seizing the same, or to the collector or other chief officer of the customs at the nearest port, that he claims the things so seized or intends to claim them, whereupon proceedings shall be taken for the forfeiture and condemnation thereof either by information filed in . . . the High Court of Justice in England (j) on the Revenue side, or exhibited before any justice of the peace ; but if any things so seized shall be of a perishable nature, or consist of horses or other animals, the same may by direction of the Commissioners of Customs be sold, and the proceeds thereof retained to abide the result of any claim that may legally be made in respect thereof.'

By sect. 208, 'All seizures whatsoever which shall have been made and condemned under the Customs Acts or any other Act by which seizures are authorised to be made by officers of customs shall be disposed of in such manner as the Commissioners of Customs may direct.'

By sect. 209, 'When any seizure shall have been made or any fine or penalty incurred or inflicted, or any person committed to prison for any offence under the Customs Acts, the Commissioners of the Treasury or Customs may direct the restoration of such seizure, whether condemnation shall have taken place or not, or waive proceedings, or mitigate or remit such fine or penalty, or release from confinement either before or after conviction such person on any terms and conditions as they shall see fit.'

Bribes.—Sect. 217, after imposing penalties on officials who make collusive seizures or take bribes, enacts that, 'Every person who shall give or offer, or promise to give or procure to be given, any bribe recompense or reward to, or shall make any collusive agreement with any such officer or person as aforesaid, to induce him in any way to neglect his duty, or to do, conceal or connive at any act whereby any of the provisions of any Act of Parliament relating to the Customs may be evaded, shall forfeit the sum of £200' (k).

By sect. 11 of the Customs, &c., Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 21) (l), 'All duties, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under or imposed by the Customs Acts, and the liability to forfeiture of any goods seized under the authority thereof, may be sued for prosecuted determined and recovered by action information or other appropriate proceeding in the High Court of Justice in England' . . . (k) In R. v. Everett, 8 B. & C. 114; 2 M. & R. 35, a case under 6 Geo. IV. c. 108, s. 34 (rep.), a count alleged that certain spirituous liquors were about to be imported, in respect of which certain duties would be payable, and that R. H. was a person employed in the service of the customs of our Lord the King, and that it was the duty of R. H., as such person so employed in the service of the customs as aforesaid, to arrest and detain all such goods and merchandise as should within his knowledge be imported which, upon such importation thereof, would become forfeited; and that the defendant unlawfully solicited R. H. to forbear an arrest and detain the said goods; it was objected, in arrest of judgment, that as the law did not cast upon all persons in the service of the customs the duty of making seizures, and the count did not shew that H. was a person coming within any of the three classes described in 6 Geo. IV. c. 108, the count was bad: and the Court held that the allegation that it was H.'s duty to seize the goods, which upon importation were forfeited, was an allegation of matter of law. That being so, the facts from which that duty arose ought to have been stated in the count. If, indeed, it could be said to be the duty of every person employed in the service of the customs to seize such goods, then the allegation would have been sufficient. But it clearly was not the duty of every such person, and therefore the indictment was bad. As to proof of character of the official, see now s. 261 of the Act of 1876, post, p. 386.

in the name of some officer of customs or excise, before one or more justices of the peace in the United Kingdom' . . . 'provided always that 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 44 (m), shall not apply to any offence against the Customs laws : and provided that in any proceedings for any penalty or forfeiture under the Customs Acts the fact that the duties of customs have been secured by bond or otherwise shall not be pleaded or made use of in answer to or in stay of any such proceedings.'

By sect. 53 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), 'The Summary Jurisdiction Acts shall, notwithstanding any special provisions to the contrary contained in any of the statutes relating to His Majesty's Revenue under the control of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the Commissioners of Customs, apply to all informations, complaints, and other proceedings before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction under or by virtue of any of the said statutes' (n).

Offences on the Water.—By sect. 229 of the Act of 1876, 'Where any offence shall be committed in any place upon the water not being within any county of the United Kingdom, or where the officers have any doubt whether such place is within the boundaries or limits of any such county, such offence shall for the purposes of the Customs Acts be deemed and taken to be an offence committed on the high seas ; and for the purpose of giving jurisdiction under such Acts every offence shall be deemed to have been committed, and every cause of complaint to have arisen, either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place on land where the offender or person complained against may be or be brought' (o).

Sect. 230, as amended in 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 55, s. 8), provides that where the attendance of a justice of the county where the offence was committed cannot conveniently be obtained, resort may be had to a justice of a neighbouring or adjoining county, or neighbouring or adjoining borough having separate magisterial jurisdiction, and geographically situate within the county where the offence was committed.

Imprisonment.—By sect. 12 of the Customs Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 21) (oo), 'When any verdict shall pass or conviction be had against any person for any offence against the Customs Acts, and he shall have been adjudged to pay a penalty of one hundred pounds or upwards, the presiding justice may, if for a first offence, commit the offender to one of His Majesty's prisons for not less than six nor more than nine months, and if for a subsequent offence, may order that the offender shall, in lieu of payment of the penalty, be imprisoned, . . . with or without hard labour, for a period of not less than six nor more than twelve months.'

By the proviso to sect. 53 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), where the sum adjudged by conviction under or by virtue of any of the said statutes (relating to inland revenue or customs) 'to be paid exceeds £50, the period of imprisonment imposed by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction in respect of the non-payment of such sum, Forcible opposition to the execution of the Spirits Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 24), is punishable under sect. 150 of that Act.

C.—ASSESSSED TAXES.

Obstruction of officers of inland revenue or persons acting in their aid in collecting taxes is now ordinarily punishable under sect. 11 of the Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 21) (c).

The following decisions upon Acts now repealed relate to assaults on revenue officials engaged in the collection of assessed taxes.

In R. v. Ford (d), upon an indictment charging the defendants with assaulting J. S., then being in lawful possession of goods seized for £6 15s. 6d., arrears of assessed taxes, and in another count with a common assault, it appeared that the goods of one F. had been distrained on his premises for taxes due from him, and J. S. had been left in possession. In order to shew that the taxes had been regularly demanded before putting in the distress, it was proved that the collector had gone to F.'s house on January 23, and F. not being at home, had demanded the taxes of a female who was there, and said that he had called often before, and would distrain on the following day if they were not paid. The woman answered that F. had been told before of the collector's coming for taxes, but said he could not pay; the collector left a message with the woman, requesting F. to call on him, which F. afterwards did, and stated that he was very poor and could not pay. It was objected that this was not sufficient evidence of a demand and refusal within the terms of 43 Geo. III. c. 99, s. 33 (e); but Denman, C.J., held that it

(a) This provision would probably be held to extend only to assaults upon officers when in the execution of their duty. If, therefore, upon an indictment containing counts for assaulting an officer in the execution of his duty, and for a common assault, the jury were to acquit on all the counts except on that for the common assault, the judgment would be arrested if the venue were laid in any county except that in which the assault was committed. R. v.

Cartwright, 4 T. R. 490.

(b) Ss. 40, 41, and 43 have not been repealed by subsequent legislation with reference to the excise.

(c) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 38, does not contain the provisions inserted in prior Acts as to assaults on revenue officers.

(d) 2 A. & E. 588.

(e) Repealed in 1880 and replaced by s. 86 of the Taxes Management Act (43 & 44 Vict. c. 19).

was not necessary to shew a refusal given by the householder himself, or to the collector personally; but that it was sufficient, if the circumstances shewed that the householder, from poverty or otherwise, would not pay, and if the party meeting with the refusal was one authorised to act for him: and he left it to the jury to say whether they were satisfied that there had been a refusal. He also held that upon the second count, which mentioned no sum, there might be a verdict against the defendants, if the prosecutor was lawfully in possession for any amount. A motion for a new trial was refused; the Court holding that by the statute a distress was to be taken only if there had been a demand and refusal of the taxes, but nothing was said to apply that provision to particular individuals, or particular sums; and that it was sufficient if there had been a demand of the taxes, which the party had understood, and he had not objected to the amount, but had refused to pay (f).

In R. v. Clark (g), C. and A. were indicted for assaulting G., a peace officer, in the execution of his duty, and for a common assault. T., a collector of land-tax, had applied on October 28 to C. for arrears of land-tax due from him, which had been repeatedly demanded before; C. said, 'I suppose if I do not pay it, you are going to distrain?' T. replied that he probably should. C. answered, 'If you put your hand upon anything, I will split your skull.' On November 29 following, T. went to C.'s house, with B., G., and a third constable: he desired the two last to remain outside, and to be on the alert, lest there should be a row; he and B. entered a room, and again demanded the arrears; as soon as the demand was made C. quitted the room, and directly afterwards he was heard to fasten the house door; upon this, B., by T.'s order, unfastened the door, and brought in G. and the other constable. C. soon afterwards returned into the room, with bank-notes in his hand, accompanied by ten or twelve men, among whom was A. C. asked what G. did there; and B. answered that G. was there to aid and assist if required: upon this C. said, 'I will not pay the taxes till the thief-catcher has left the room.' G. refused to depart, upon which C. desired A. to put him out, saying that he would be answerable; A. then attempted to force G. out of the room, and, in so doing, committed the assault in question. C. afterwards paid the taxes with the notes in his hand. It was left to the jury to say, whether T. introduced G. for the purpose of keeping the peace, and if they thought he did so, they were directed to find a verdict of guilty; the jury found in the affirmative of the question left, and convicted both defendants. Upon a motion for a new trial, it was contended that the collector had no right to take a constable with him; that it ought to have been shewn that the collector had a warrant to distrain, or the book of assessments with him; but it was held that it was not necessary that the collector should have either the warrant or the book of assessments with him; and although the statute was applicable only to cases where a house or chest was to be broken open, and therefore the collector had no right to take B. or any other person with him for the purpose of demanding the money; yet as the collector had good ground, from what had passed at that time and on the previous occasion, to apprehend violence, he was perfectly justified in introducing G. and the other constable to keep the peace, and that G. was justified in remaining to prevent violence, and consequently was assaulted whilst in the execution of his duty. And although the collector had no right to take B. into the house on either occasion, yet, as no objection was made to his presence, it did not vary the case (h).

The other offences against the Acts relating to the Income Tax or Land Tax which are indictable are in the nature of forgery, perjury, or false declarations.

Income Tax.—Forgery of receipts or certificates given under the Income Tax Act, 1842, or assisting in such forgery, or issuing such documents with intent to defraud the Crown or any corporation or person, is felony punishable by penal servitude from three to fourteen years, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not over two years (i).

Wilfully and corruptly giving false evidence on oath or affirmation, in an affidavit, deposition, or affirmation authorised by the Income Tax Act, 1842, is punishable as perjury, and may be tried in any county in which the affidavit, &c., is exhibited to the Income Tax Commissioners (j).

Land Tax.—The forgery of land tax redemption certificates is felony (k) punishable by penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or by imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years (l).

Perjury in matters under the Land Tax Acts is punishable under 42 Geo. III. c. 116, s. 193.

Death Duties.—Perjury with reference to death duties is punishable under 48 Geo. III. c. 149, s. 37 (E), and 56 Geo. III. c. 156, s. 131 (I).

BOOK THE FIFTH.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST RELIGION AND PUBLIC WORSHIP.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF BLASPHEMY.

AT common law it is an indictable misdemeanor (a), punishable by fine and (or) imprisonment (b), to speak or otherwise publish any matter blaspheming God, e.g., by denying His existence or providence, or contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ, or vilifying or bringing into disbelief or contempt or ridicule (c) Christianity in general (d), or any doctrine of the Christian religion, or the Bible (e), or the Book of Common Prayer (f).

Christian Religion.—Upon the trial of an information in the Court of King's Bench, for uttering expressions grossly blasphemous, Hale, C.J., said, that 'such kind of wicked blasphemous words were not only an offence to God and religion, but a crime against the laws, state, and government, and therefore punishable in this Court: for to say religion is a cheat is to dissolve all those obligations whereby civil society is preserved; and Christianity is part of the laws of England, and therefore to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law' (g).

Where the defendant had been convicted for publishing blasphemous libels, in which the miracles of our Saviour were turned into ridicule and contempt, and His life and conversation calumniated, it was moved in arrest of judgment that this was not an offence within the cognisance of the temporal courts at common law; but the Court would not suffer the point to be argued, saying that the Christian religion, as established in this kingdom, is part of the law ; and, therefore, that whatever derided Christianity derided the law, and consequently must be an offence against the law (h).

(a) The offence does not seem to have been dealt with by the common-law Courts until after the abolition of the Courts of Star Chamber and High Commission. See Traske's case (Com. Stell.), Hob. 382. Atwood's case, Cro. Jac. 421. R. v. Curl, 2 Str. 790; 1 Hawk. c. 5.

(b) At the discretion of the Court. The older authorities say that infamous corporal punishment might be imposed for blasphemy. Offenders were at one time put in the pillory. R. v. Annet, 1 W. Bl. 395; 3 Burn Eccl. Law (9th ed.), 386. And see 2 Rolle Abr. 78. They could be put under recognisances to be of good behaviour for life; vide R. v. Annet.

The accuracy of these dicta, and of the old authorities upon which they are based, was challenged arguendo, in R. v. Hetherington (i), and to some extent questioned in R. v. Ramsay (j), but Hale's conclusion has been accepted as the law in many cases (k).

On the trial of a criminal information against the defendant for publishing a false, malicious, and scandalous libel upon a religious order, professing the Roman Catholic faith, called the Scorton Nunnery, Alderson, B., said, ' a person may, without being liable to prosecution for it, attack Judaism or Mahomedanism, or even any sect of the Christian religion (save the established religion of the country), and the only reason why the latter is in a different situation from the other is, because it is the form established by law, and is therefore a part of the constitution of the country. In like manner and for the same reason any general attack on Christianity (l) is the subject of a criminal prosecution, because Christianity is the established religion of the country. The defendant here has a right to entertain his opinions, to express them, to discuss the subject of the Roman Catholic religion, and its institutions ' ; but he ruled that there was no right in so doing to attack the characters of individuals (m).

By Statute.—Some provisions have also been made upon this subject by statutes. 1 Edw. VI. c. 1 (n), enacts, that persons reviling the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper by contemptuous words or otherwise, shall suffer imprisonment. 1 Eliz. c. 2 (o), enacts, that if any minister shall speak anything in derogation of the Book of Common Prayer, he shall, if not beneficed, be imprisoned one year for the first offence, and for life for the second (2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 1, s. 3) ; and if he be beneficed, shall for the first offence be imprisoned six months and forfeit a year's value of his benefice ; for the second, shall be deprived and suffer one year's imprisonment ; and for the third, shall in like manner be deprived and suffer imprisonment for life. And that if any person whatsoever shall in plays, songs, or other open words, speak anything in derogation, depraving, or despising of the said book, or shall forcibly prevent the reading of it, or cause any other service to be read in its stead, he shall forfeit for the first offence 100 marks ; for the second, 400 ; and for the third, shall forfeit all his goods and chattels, and suffer imprisonment for life. This Act (1 Edw. VI. c. 1) was at the Restoration applied to the Prayer Book of 1662 (14 Car. II. c. 4, s. 1).

The Toleration Act, 1688 (1 Will. and M. c. 18), s. 17, enacted, that whosoever should deny in his preaching or writing the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity, should lose all benefit of the Act for granting toleration.

(o) Partly repealed 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102 ;
 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59 ; but not so as to affect the provisions here mentioned.

This section was repealed in 1813 by 53 Geo. III. c. 160 : but while it was in force it was considered as operating to deprive the offender of the benefit of the Toleration Act, leaving the punishment of the offence as for a misdemeanor at common law (p). An Act of 1698 (9 Will. III. c. 35 (9 & 10 Will. III. c. 32 (Ruffhead))), entitled 'an Act for the more effectual suppressing of blasphemy and profaneness' enacts, that if any person, educated in or having made profession of the Christian religion, shall, by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, [deny any one of the Persons in the Holy Trinity to be God (q), or] should assert or maintain there are more gods than one, or should deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of divine authority, he should, on lawful conviction on indictment or information in any of His Majesty's Courts at Westminster, at the assizes, by the oath of two or more credible witnesses, upon the first offence be rendered incapable to hold any office or place of trust ; and for the second be rendered incapable of bringing any action, being guardian, executor, legatee, or purchaser of lands, and should suffer three years' imprisonment without bail (r). The statute does not abrogate the common law, but is cumulative (s). Thus in R. v. Richard Carlile (t), made in arrest of judgment on an information for a blasphemous libel, on the ground that this statute had put an end to the common law offence : in summing up to the jury, Abbott, C. J., said : ' If the whole Act of Will. III. had been repealed, the common law would still have remained ' ; and on a motion made the Court were clear that it had not. On few branches of the law has there been more change in the policy of prosecution, and the views of the judges, than in that relating to blasphemy. Prosecutions were numerous early in the nineteenth century (u). Since 1837 they have been few. There is one reported in 1857 (v). The latest of any importance were in 1882 (w) and 1908 (x). The opinions of the judges have also changed with respect to the essential elements of the offence : and the gist of the offence is not now considered to be in holding an opinion (y) contrary to the general tenets of Christianity, or the particular doctrines of the Church of England, which may be heretical, but in the mode of expressing it (z). an indictment for publishing a blasphemous book, it was moved in arrest of judgment, that as the intent of the book was only to shew that the miracles of Jesus Christ were not to be taken in their literal sense, it could not be considered as attacking Christianity in general, but only as striking against one received proof of His being the Messiah; to which the Court said, that the attacking Christianity in the way in which it was attacked in this publication was destroying the very foundation of it; and that, though there were professions in the book that its design was to establish Christianity upon a true bottom by considering these narrations in Scripture as emblematical and prophetic, yet that such professions were not to be credited, and that the rule is allegatio contra factum non est admittenda. But the Court also said, that though to write against Christianity in general is clearly an offence at common law, they laid stress upon the word general, and did not intend to include disputes between learned men upon particular controverted points; and, in delivering the judgment of the Court, Raymond, C.J., said: 'I would have it taken notice of that we do not meddle with any differences of opinion, and that we interpose only where the very root of Christianity itself is struck at.'

It is said by Blackstone (b) that 'contumely and contempt are what no establishment can tolerate: but, on the other hand, it would not be proper to lay any restraint upon rational and dispassionate discussions of the rectitude and propriety of the established mode of worship.' In Starkie on Libel (1st ed.), 496, 497, it is said that 'it may not be going too far to infer, from the principles and decisions, that no author or preacher who fairly and conscientiously promulgates the opinions with whose truth he is impressed, for the benefit of others, is, for so doing, amenable as a criminal; but a malicious and mischievous intention is in such case the broad boundary between right and wrong; and that if it can be collected, from the offensive levity with which so serious a subject is treated, or from other circumstances, that the act of the party was malicious, then, since the law has no means of distinguishing between different degrees of evil tendency, if the matter published contain any such tendency, the publisher becomes amenable to justice' (c). In R. v. Mary Carlile (d), Best, J., ruled that the jury must inquire whether the alleged libel was a temperate discussion of the truth of Christianity or an attempt to vilify and degrade it, to excite prejudice and not to convince.

In R. v. Richard Carlile (e), the Court appears to have considered that a fair, reasonable, open, and temperate discussion of the religion of this country was not blasphemy.

It is a question for the jury whether or not the words amount to a blasphemous libel. The wilful intention to insult and mislead others by means of licentious and contumelious abuse offered to sacred subjects

(d) [1821] 1 St. Tr. (N. S.) 1033. The prosecution was in respect of a pamphlet, in which the morality of the Old and New Testaments were contrasted, and the former was declared to be 'full of contradictions and wickedness.'

or by wilful misrepresentations or wilful sophistry calculated to mislead the ignorant and unwary, is the criterion and test of guilt. A malicious and mischievous intention, or what is equivalent to such an intention in law as well as morals—a state of apathy and indifference to the interests of society—is the broad boundary between right and wrong (f). ‘To asperse the truth of Christianity cannot per se be sufficient to sustain a criminal prosecution for blasphemy. To maintain that merely because the truth of Christianity is denied without more, therefore the person denying it may be indicted for blasphemous libel is, I venture to think, absolutely untrue. It is a view of the law which cannot be historically justified. Parliament, the supreme authority as to old law, has passed Acts which render the dicta of the judges in former times no longer applicable. And it is no disparagement to their authority to say that observations which were made under one state of the law are no longer applicable under a different state of things. As I observed before, I put it as a reductio ad absurdum that if it was enough to say that “Christianity was part of the law of the land,” then there could be no discussion on any part of the law of the land, and it would be impossible, for example, to discuss in a grave argumentative way the question of a monarchical form of government, as Harrington discussed it in his “Oceana,” without being liable to be indicted for a seditious libel. I was not aware that what I then put as a reductio ad absurdum had been judicially held, and that a man had actually been convicted of a seditious libel (R. v. Bedford, Gilbert’s Rep. K.B. 297) (g), for discussing such a question, his work containing, as the report states, no reflection upon the existing government. No judge or jury in our day would convict a man of seditious libel in such a case,—it would be regarded as monstrous. I have no doubt therefore that the mere denial of the truth of Christianity is not enough to constitute the offence of blasphemy. . . . Whatever the older cases may have been, the fact remains that Parliament has altered the law as to religion. It is no longer the law that none but believers in Christianity can hold office in the State. The state of things is no longer the same as when the older judgments were pronounced,—judgments, however, which have been strained, I think, beyond what they will justly warrant. . . . The defendants have admitted that these publications were intended to be attacks on Christianity and on the Hebrew Scriptures, and have cited a number of passages from approved writers which they say are to the same effect. That may be so . . . and I lay it down as law that if the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of religion may be attacked without the writer being guilty of blasphemy. But no one can fail to see the difference between the works of the writers who have been quoted and the language used in the publications now before us, and I am obliged to say that it is different not only in degree but in kind and nature. There is a grave and earnest tone, a reverent, perhaps I might even say a religious, spirit about the very attacks on Christianity itself which we find in the authors referred to which shews that what they aimed at was not insult to the opinions of the majority of mankind nor to Christianity itself, but real, quiet, earnest pursuit of truth. And if the truth at which they have arrived is not that which you and I have been taught and at which perhaps we might now arrive, it is not because their conclusions differ from ours that they are to be deemed fit subjects for criminal prosecution' (h).

The rulings above given have been criticised by Sir James Stephen as amounting to a judicial change in the law (i). But their substance has been accepted as correct in the most recent prosecution, R. v. Boulter (j), an indictment for blasphemous speeches, where Phillimore, J., directed the jury as follows: 'A man is free to speak and teach what he pleases as to religious matters, though not as to morals. He is free to teach what he likes as to religious matters even if it is unbelief. But when we come to consider whether he has exceeded the limits, we must not neglect to consider the place where he speaks, and the persons to whom he speaks. A man is not free in a public place where passers by who might not willingly go to listen to him knowing what he was going to say might accidentally hear his words, or where young people might be present. A man is not free in such places to use coarse ridicule on subjects which are sacred to most people in the country. He is free to use arguments.' He suggested further that it was for the jury to draw the line, and they should do so in favour of the accused if he were arguing in favour of his honest belief or unbelief, but not if he were making a scurrilous attack on the beliefs of most people in a public place where passers by might have their ears offended or the young might come. Such conduct would tend to a breach of the peace by hot-headed believers.

In a case where a pamphlet stated that Jesus Christ was an impostor, a murderer in principle, and a fanatic, a juryman asked whether a work denying the divinity of our Saviour was blasphemous; and Abbott, C.J., answered that a work speaking of Jesus Christ in the language used in the pamphlet was blasphemous; and on a motion for a new trial, on the ground that this was a wrong answer, the Court held that the answer was right (k).

In R. v. Williams (l), in pronouncing the judgment of the Court of King's Bench upon a person convicted of blasphemy in respect of having published Paine's 'Age of Reason,' Ashhurst, J., said, that, although the Almighty did not require the aid of human tribunals to vindicate His precepts, it was, nevertheless, fit to shew our abhorrence of such wicked doctrines as were not only an offence against God, but against all law and government, from their direct tendency to dissolve all the bonds and obligations of civil society; and that it was upon this ground that the Christian religion constituted part of the law of the land. That if the name of our Redeemer was suffered to be traduced, and His holy religion treated with contempt, the solemnity of an oath, on which the due administration of justice depended, would be destroyed, and the law be stripped of one of its principal sanctions, the dread of future punishments (m).

In R. v. Petcherine (n), a Roman Catholic priest was indicted for burning a copy of the Authorised Version of the Scriptures, but was acquitted.

It has already been stated that it is immaterial whether the publication is oral or written (o). Committing mischievous matter to print or writing, and thereby affording it a wider circulation, may be an aggravation of the offence, and affect the measure of punishment (p). On the other hand, the open speaking of blasphemous matter in a public place where many must pass may be a graver offence than abuse of religion at a ticket meeting of a secular society (q).

Pleas, &c.—The privilege attaching to reports of judicial proceedings does not cover the republication of blasphemous matter. This was so laid down in R. v. Mary Carlile (r), where the defendant published the proceedings at the trial of Richard Carlile (s), in which he read to the jury the whole of Paine's 'Age of Reason.'

In R. v. Creevey (t), which related to proceedings in Parliament, Bayley, J., said: 'It has been argued that the proceedings of Courts of justice are open to publication. Against that, as an unqualified proposition, I enter my protest. Suppose an indictment for blasphemy, or a trial where indecent evidence was necessarily introduced; would every one be at liberty to poison the minds of the public, by circulating that which for the purposes of justice the Court is bound to hear? I should think not: and it is not true, therefore, that in all instances the proceedings of a Court of justice may be published.'

The provisions of the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 64), giving privilege to fair and accurate reports in newspapers of proceedings in courts of justice and public meetings, expressly exclude blasphemous matter from the privilege (u).

The provisions of the Libel Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), s. 6, as to justification, do not extend to blasphemous libel (v). At common law it is no answer to an indictment for blasphemy to prove the truth of the attack on Christianity which is the subject of the indictment (w); in one case the Court went so far as to punish as contempt the persistence of the defendant in reviling Christianity in the course and as part of his defence (x). In other cases the Court has stopped attempts to repeat or justify the alleged blasphemy as part of the defence (y).

(m) This libel attacked the truth of the Old and New Testaments; arguing that there was no genuine revelation of the will of God existing in the world; and that reason was the only true faith which laid any obligations on the conduct of mankind. In other respects also it ridiculed and vilified the prophets, our Saviour, His disciples, and the Holy Scriptures.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF DISTURBANCES IN CHURCHYARDS OR PLACES OF PUBLIC
WORSHIP (a).

AFFRAYS in a church or churchyard have always been esteemed very heinous offences, as being very great indignities to the Divine Majesty, to whose worship and service such places are immediately dedicated ; and upon this consideration all irreverent behaviour in these places has been esteemed criminal by the makers of our laws. So that many disturbances occurring in these places are visited with punishment which, if they happened elsewhere, would not be punishable at all ; as bare quarrelsome words : and some acts are criminal which would be commendable if done in another place ; as arrests by virtue of legal process (b).

It seems to have been recognised that it was a misdemeanor to obstruct divine service in a church, but a criminal information was refused on the ground that the alleged disturbance arose out of the intrusion as preacher by the rector of a methodist who did not hold a licence to preach from the bishop of the diocese (c).

Several statutes have been passed for the purpose of preventing disturbances in places of worship belonging to the established church, and also in those belonging to congregations of Protestant Dissenters and Roman Catholics.

By an Act of 1551 (5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4), s. 1, ‘ if any person whatsoever shall . . . by words only, quarrel, chide, or brawl in any church or churchyard . . . then it shall be lawful unto the ordinary of the place where the same offence shall be done, and proved by two lawful witnesses, to suspend every person so offending ; that is to say, [if he be a layman, ab ingressu ecclesiæ, and (d)] if he be a clerk, from the ministration of his office, for so long time as the said ordinary shall by his discretion think meet and convenient, according to the fault.’

By sect. 2, ‘ if any person or persons shall smite or lay violent hands upon any other, either in any church or churchyard, then ipso facto every

(a) The first Act of Uniformity (5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 1), s. 2, imposes a general duty on people to go to church, and conferred a general right correlatively to go to church. These provisions are repealed as to persons dissenting from the doctrines or worship of the Church of England, and as to pecuniary penalties for non-attendance at church (9 & 10 Vict. c. 89). Subject to these repeals, the Act still applies to members of the Church of England. See Taylor v. Timson, 20 person so offending shall be deemed excommunicate, and be excluded from the fellowship and company of Christ's congregation' (e).

(d) By the Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 32), this Act is repealed as to persons not in holy orders (s. 4), and the jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts to adjudicate on suits for brawling against persons not in holy orders, is taken away.

This statute was passed in aid of the ecclesiastical law for the protection of the sanctity of public worship, and in aid of the common law (e). It deals with three offences: (1) quarrelling by words only; (2) smiting or laying violent hands on another; (3) striking with a weapon, or drawing a weapon with intent to strike (f).

In 1787 (27 Geo. III. c. 31, s. 2) it was enacted that, 'no suit shall be commenced in any Ecclesiastical Court . . . for striking or brawling in any church or churchyard after the expiration of eight months from the time when such offence shall have been committed . . .'

In the construction of the Act of 1551 it has been held that the Ecclesiastical Court might proceed upon the two first sections; for though the offence mentioned in the second section of smiting in the church or churchyard is an offence at common law, and the offender may be indicted for it, yet, besides this, he may, under the statute, be ipso facto excommunicated (g). No previous conviction is necessary in this case; though, if there be one, the ordinary may use it as proof of the fact (h).

Cathedral churches, and the churchyards which belong to them, are within the statute (i). And it is no excuse for a person who strikes another in a church, &c., to shew that the other assaulted him (j). But churchwardens, or perhaps private persons, who whip boys for playing in the church, or pull off the hats of those who obstinately refuse to take them off themselves, or gently lay their hands on those who disturb the performance of any part of divine service, and turn them out of the church, were never within the meaning of the statute (k).

By an Act of 1553 (1 Mary, st. 2, c. 3), s. 2, 'if any person or persons, of their own power and authority . . . at any time after the 20th day of December next coming (1553), do or shall willingly and of purpose, by open and overt word, fact, act, or deed, maliciously or contemptuously molest, let, disturb, vex, or trouble, or by any other unlawful ways or means disquiet or misuse, any preacher or preachers, licensed, allowed, or authorised to preach by the Queen's Highness, or by any archbishop or bishop of this realm, or by any other lawful ordinary, or by any of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or otherwise lawfully authorised or charged by reason of his or their cure, benefice, or other spiritual promotion or charge, in any of his or their open sermon, preaching, or collation, that he or they shall make, declare, preach, or pronounce, in any church, chapel, churchyard, or in any other place or places, used, frequented, or appointed, or that hereafter shall be used or appointed to be preached in; or if any person or persons shall maliciously, willingly, or of purpose, molest, let, disturb, vex, disquiet, or otherwise trouble, any parson, vicar, parish priest, or curate, or any lawful priest, preparing, saying, doing, singing, ministering or celebrating the mass, or other such divine service, sacraments or sacramentals, as was most commonly frequented and used in the last year of the reign of the late sovereign lord King Henry the Eighth, or that at any time hereafter shall be allowed, set forth, or authorised, by the Queen's Majesty ; or, if any person or persons . . . after the said 20th day of December shall contemptuously, unlawfully, or maliciously pull down, deface, spoil, abuse, break, or otherwise unreverently handle or order the most blessed, comfortable, and holy sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, commonly called the Sacrament of the Altar, being, or that shall be, in any church or chapel, or in any other decent place, or the pyx or canopy wherein the said sacrament is or shall be ; or unlawfully, contemptuously, or maliciously, of their own power or authority, pull down, deface, spoil, or otherwise break, any altar or altars, or any crucifix or cross, that now or hereafter shall be in any church, chapel, or churchyard : that then every such offender, his or their aider, procurer, or abettor, aiders, procurers, or abettors, immediately and forthwith, after any of the said act or acts, or other the said misdemeanors so committed, shall be apprehended by any constable or constables, churchwarden or churchwardens of the said parish, town, or place where the said offence or offences shall be so committed, made, or done, or by any other, or by any other officer or officers, or by any other person or persons then being present at the time of the said offence or offences so unlawfully committed, made, or done : and being so apprehended, shall be brought before some justice of the peace, by whom he shall, upon due accusation, be committed forthwith ; and within six days next after the accusation the said justice, with one other justice, shall diligently examine the offence ; and if the two justices find the person guilty, by proof of two witnesses, or confession, they shall commit him to gaol for three months, and further to the quarter sessions next after the end of the three months ; at which sessions he is upon repentance to be discharged, finding surety for his good behaviour for a year ; and if he will not repent, he is to be further committed till he does (1).

The statute of 1553 merely gave to the common law cognisance of an offence, which was before punishable by the ecclesiastical law. To fall within that statute, the party must maliciously, wilfully, or of purpose, molest the person celebrating divine service. The plaintiff on a Sunday presented a notice to the parish clerk, and desired him to read it. The clerk, after consulting the minister, refused to do so. After the Nicene Creed had been read, and whilst the minister was walking from the communion table to the vestry-room, and whilst no part of the service was actually going on, the plaintiff stood up in his pew and read a notice that a vestry would be held to choose churchwardens, whereupon the minister desired a constable to take him out of the church, which the constable did, and detained him an hour after the service was over, and then allowed him to go upon promising to attend before a magistrate the next day.

(1) 1 Mary, sess. 2, c. 3, s. 1. The Act is printed in the revised edition of the statutes and is specially saved from repeal by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 6. It was held to apply to the book of Common Prayer in use under Acts of subsequent sovereigns. 1 Hawk. c. 63, s. 31 ; Gibs. 372.

It was held, that although the constable might be justified in removing him from the church, and detaining him until the service was over, he could not detain him afterwards to take him before a magistrate under this statute. Abbott, C.J., said: 'Had the notice been read by the plaintiff whilst any part of the service was actually going on, we might have thought that he had done it on purpose to molest the minister; but the act having been done during an interval when no part of the service was in the course of being performed, and the party apparently supposing that he had a right to give such a notice, I am not prepared to say that the 1 Mary, st. 2, c. 3, warranted his detention in order that he might be taken before a justice' (m).

The statute further provides, that persons rescuing offenders so apprehended as aforesaid, or hindering the arrest of offenders, shall suffer like imprisonment, and pay a fine of five pounds for each offence (n). And if any offenders are not apprehended, but escape, the escape is to be presented at the quarter sessions, and the inhabitants of the parish where the escape was suffered are to forfeit five pounds (o).

Precedents are to be met with of indictments for breaking the windows of a church, by firing a gun against them (p): but it has been doubted whether such an indictment is sustainable, as being for a mere trespass (q).

By sect. 3 of the Act of Uniformity of 1558 (1 Eliz. c. 2) (r), 'If any person or persons whatsoever, after the said feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist next coming, 24 June, 1559 . . . shall, by open fact, deed, or by open threatenings, compel or cause, or otherwise procure or maintain any parson, vicar, or other minister in any cathedral or parish church, or in chapel, or in any other place to sing or say any common or open prayer, &c. . . . or that by any of the said means shall unlawfully interrupt or let any parson, vicar, or other minister in any cathedral, parish church, chapel, or any other place to sing or say common or open prayer, or to minister the sacraments or any of them in such manner and form as is mentioned in the said book (s): that then every such person being lawfully convicted in form aforesaid' (i.e., 'according to the laws of this realm, by verdict of twelve men, or his own confession, or by the notorious evidence of the fact' (sect. 1)), 'shall forfeit to the Queen . . . for the first offence 100 marks . . .' or in default of payment within six weeks of conviction imprisonment for six months, on a second conviction 400 marks, or in default, &c., imprisonment for twelve months, and, on a third conviction, forfeiture of all his goods and chattels and imprisonment for life. The Act of 1558 was in 1662 (14 Car. II. c. 4) applied to the Prayer Book then put into use.

Methodists and dissenters from the Established Church have a right to protection if interrupted in their decent and quiet devotions (t).

(t) R. v. Wroughton, 3 Burr. 1683, 1684, Lord Mansfield. This does not refer to any statute.

The Toleration Act of 1688 (1 Will. & M. c. 18) (u) provides (sect. 15) (v), that 'if any person or persons, at any time or times after the 10th day of June' (1688) 'do and shall, willingly and of purpose, maliciously or contemptuously, come into any cathedral or parish church, chapel, or other congregation permitted by this Act, and disquiet or disturb the same, or misuse any preacher or teacher, such person or persons, upon proof thereof before any justice of peace, by two or more sufficient witnesses, shall find two sureties to be bound by recognisance in the penal sum of fifty pounds, and in default of such sureties shall be committed to prison, there to remain till the next general or quarter sessions; and upon conviction of the said offence at the said general or quarter sessions, shall suffer the pain and penalty of twenty pounds, to the use of the King's and Queen's Majesties, their heirs and successors' (w).

Before this statute the Court of King's Bench refused to grant a certiorari to remove an indictment found at the sessions against a person not behaving himself modestly and reverently at the church during divine service; for, although the offence was punishable by ecclesiastical censures, the Court considered it properly came within the cognisance of the justices of the peace (x). An indictment upon the Toleration Act, sect. 15 (18), found at quarter sessions, may be removed by certiorari before verdict, notwithstanding the words of the statute, which seem at the first view to confine the cognisance of the offence to the justices in the first instance, and in the next to the quarter sessions (y).

The oaths taken by a preacher under this Act (z) were matter of record, and could not be proved by parol evidence; but it was not necessary, upon an indictment for disturbing a dissenting congregation, to prove that the minister had taken the oaths (a). It is no defence to such an indictment that the defendant committed the outrage for the purpose of asserting his right to the situation of clerk (b). And it has been held that a congregation of foreign Lutherans, conducting the service of their chapel in the German language, are within the protection of the statute (c). Upon the conviction of several defendants, each of them is liable to a penalty of twenty pounds (d).

The Toleration Act only applies where the thing is done wilfully, and of purpose to disturb the congregation or misuse the minister (e).

By the Places of Religious Worship Act, 1812 (52 Geo. III. c. 155), s. 12, 'If any person or persons, at any time after the passing of this Act (July 29, 1812), do and shall wilfully and maliciously or contemptuously disquiet or disturb any meeting, assembly, or congregation of persons

By sect. 14 nothing contained in the Act shall extend to Quakers, nor to any meetings or assemblies for religious worship held or convened by them.

By the Roman Catholic Churches Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 115), s. 1, British subjects professing the Roman Catholic religion were, as to their places for religious worship in Great Britain, made subject to the same laws as Protestant dissenters in England.

Sect. 2 of the Religious Disabilities Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 59), makes places for religious worship of His Majesty's subjects professing the Jewish religion subject to the same laws as His Majesty's Protestant subjects dissenting from the Church of England; and by sect. 4 of the same Act, 'all laws now (August 18, 1846) in force against the wilfully and maliciously or contemptuously disquieting or disturbing any meeting, assembly, or congregation of persons assembled for religious worship permitted or authorised by any former Act or Acts of Parliament, or the disturbing, molesting, or misusing any preacher, teacher, or person officiating at such meeting, assembly, or congregation, or any person or persons there assembled, shall apply respectively to all meetings, assemblies, or congregations whatsoever of persons lawfully assembled for religious worship, and the preachers, teachers, or persons officiating at such last-mentioned meetings, assemblies, or congregations, and the persons there assembled.'

By the Liberty of Religious Worship Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 86), s. 1, 'nothing contained' (in the recited Acts—1 Will. & M. sess. 1, c. 18, and 52 Geo. III. c. 155, supra) 'shall apply, (1), to any congregation or assembly for religious worship held in any parish or ecclesiastical district, and conducted by the incumbent, or in case the incumbent is not resident, by the curate of such parish or district, or by any person authorised by them respectively; (2), to any congregation or assembly for religious worship meeting in a private dwelling-house or on the premises belonging thereto; (3), to any congregation or assembly for religious worship meeting occasionally in any building or buildings not usually appropriated to purposes of religious worship. And no person permitting any such congregation to meet as herein-mentioned in any place occupied by him shall be liable to any penalty for so doing.' The same Act further provides (sect. 2) that so much of the Acts of 1832 and 1846 as (supra) relates to the places of religious worship of Roman Catholics and Jews 'shall be respectively read as applicable to the laws to which Protestant dissenters are subject for the time being after the passing of this Act' (August 14, 1855).

By the Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 23), s. 2, 'any person (f) who shall be guilty of riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour (g), in England or Ireland, in any cathedral church, parish or district church or chapel of the Church of England and Ireland, or in any chapel of any religious denomination, or in England in any place of religious worship duly certified under the provisions of The Places of Worship Registration Act, 1855 (h), whether during the celebration of divine service or at any other time, or in any churchyard or burial ground, or who shall molest, disturb, vex, or trouble, or by any other unlawful means disquiet or misuse any preacher duly authorised to preach therein, or any clergyman in holy orders ministering or celebrating any sacrament, or any divine service, rite, or office (i) in any cathedral, church, or chapel, or in any churchyard or burial ground, shall, on conviction thereof before two justices, for every such offence be liable to a penalty of not more than £5 for every such offence, or may, if the justices before whom he shall be convicted think fit, instead of being subjected to any pecuniary penalty, be committed to prison for any time not exceeding two months.' By sect. 3, every offender 'after the said misdemeanor so committed immediately and forthwith may be apprehended by any constable or churchwarden of the parish or place' where the offence is committed (sect. 3). An appeal lies to quarter sessions from any conviction (sect. 4).

By sect. 36 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), 'Whosoever shall, by threats or force, obstruct or prevent, or endeavour to obstruct or prevent, any clergyman or other minister in or from celebrating divine service or otherwise officiating in any church, chapel, meeting house, or other place of divine worship, or in or from the performance of his duty in the lawful burial of the dead in any churchyard or other burial place, or shall strike or offer any violence to, or shall, upon any civil process, or under the pretence of executing any civil process, arrest any clergyman or other minister who is engaged in, or to the knowledge of the offender is about to engage in, any of the rites or duties in this section aforesaid, or who to the knowledge of the offender shall be going to perform the same or returning from the performance thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (j).

(f) This enactment applies to clergy as well as laity. Vallancy v. Fletcher [1897], 1 Q.B. 265. Persons in holy orders are also liable to proceedings in Ecclesiastical Courts under 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4 (supra, p. 401), or the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 32). Girt v. Fillingham [1901], Prob. 176.

(j) This section was new in England in 1861, except that part which applies to the arrest of any clergyman while performing divine service, or going to perform the same, or returning from the performance thereof, which was contained in both 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 23 (E), and 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 27 (I). The rest of the clause was framed on the Irish Acts of 27 Geo. III. c. 15, s. 5; 40 Geo. III. c. 96, s. 5; 5 Geo. IV. c. 25, s. 5; and 5 & 6 Vict. sess. 2, c. 28, ss. 7, 19. The amendments consist in including ministers not of the Church of England and Ireland, and all places of divine worship, and all burial places, and in adding the endeavour to prevent or obstruct, the offering any violence to, and the

By the Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 41), which provides for burials without the rites of the Church of England, sect. 7, 'All burials under this Act, whether with or without a religious service, shall be conducted in a decent and orderly manner, and every person guilty of riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour at any burial under this Act, or wilfully obstructing such burial or any such service as aforesaid thereat, or who shall in any such churchyard or graveyard as aforesaid deliver any address not being part of or incidental to a religious service permitted by this Act, and not otherwise permitted by any lawful authority, or who shall, under colour of any religious service or otherwise in any such churchyard or graveyard, wilfully endeavour to bring into contempt or obloquy the Christian religion, or the belief or worship of any church or denomination of Christians, or the members or any minister of any such church or denomination, or any other person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 8, 'All powers and authorities now existing by law for the preservation of order and for the prevention and punishment of disorderly behaviour in any churchyard or graveyard may be exercised in any case of burial under this Act in the same manner and by the same persons as if the same had been a burial according to the rites of the Church of England.'

Where a Protestant lecturer held meetings in public places in Liverpool and used language and gestures highly insulting to the religion of the numerous Roman Catholic inhabitants, it was held that a magistrate had jurisdiction to bind him over to be of good behaviour. It was considered but not directly decided that the power to put under such recognisances attaches where language, though not directly inciting to a breach of the peace, is calculated to cause breaches of the peace by others (k).

The facts attending disturbances of religious assemblies may sometimes justify proceedings at common law for conspiracy or riot (l): and under sect. 11 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97) (m), it is a felony for persons riotously assembled to demolish or pull down any church or chapel, or any chapel for the religious worship of persons dissenting from the worship of the United Church of England and Ireland.

CANADIAN NOTES.

OF DISTURBANCES IN CHURCHYARDS OR PLACES OF WORSHIP.

Obstructing Officiating Clergymen.—Code sec. 199.

The offence of unlawfully obstructing divine service is not made out where the clergyman obstructed had no legal claim to the possession of or use of the church premises and was in point of law himself a trespasser thereon. But an indictment for obstructing a clergyman in celebrating divine service will not be quashed for failure to allege therein that the clergyman was in lawful charge of the church or place of worship. R. v. Wasyl Kapij (1905), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 186.

Violence to Officiating Clergyman.—Code sec. 200.

Disturbing Meetings for Religious Worship or Special Purposes.—Code sec. 201.

A person who enters a hall, leased by a religious association or body, while a meeting for religious worship is being held in it under the direction of officers of the association, and addressing himself to the assemblage, says that he is a Catholic and a French Canadian, as most of them are, that they should not stay where they are, and calls upon them to leave, is guilty of the offence of disturbing a religious meeting, under Cr. Code sec. 201. R. v. Gauthier, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 263.

A meeting of the electors called by one of the candidates during a municipal election is not included. R. v. Lavoie, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 39.

BOOK THE SIXTH.

OF DISTURBANCES OF THE PUBLIC PEACE.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF RIOTS, ROUTS, UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLIES AND AFFRAYS.

SECT. I.—RIOTS.

A. Common Law.

Riot.—A riot is a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons (a) or more, who assemble together of their own authority, with an intent mutually to assist one another against any who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually execute the enterprise (aa), in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful (b). That is to say doing the act whether lawful or unlawful in a manner calculated to inspire terror is an essential element in the offence (c).

This definition was in substance adopted by Charles, J., in the case of the Trafalgar Square Riots (d). According to the latest judicial definition (e), 'There are five necessary elements of a riot: (1) a number of persons, three (f) at least; (2) common purpose; (3) execution or conception of the common purpose; (4) an intent to help one another by

(a) Women are punishable as rioters, but infants under the age of discretion are said not to be punishable. 1 Hawk. c. 65, s. 14. Vide ante, pp. 61, 98.

(aa) Some act must be done. R. v. Vincent, 9 C. & P. 91; R. v. Neale, ibid. 431.

(b) 1 Hawk. c. 65, ss. 1–5. See R. v. Birt, 5 C. & P. 154, Patteson, J. Three persons or more is the correct description of the number of persons necessary to constitute a riotous meeting; but in Hawkins (c. 65, ss. 2, 5, 7) the words 'more than three persons' are three times over inserted instead of 'three persons or more'; which in Burn's Just. tit. 'Riot,' s. 1, is remarked as an instance that, in a variety of matter, it is impossible for the mind of man to be always equally attentive. The description of riot stated in the text, and taken from Hawkins, is submitted as that which would probably be deemed most correct at the present time. It should be observed, however, that riot has been described differently by high authority. In R. v. Soley, 11 Mod. 116, Holt, C.J., said: 'The books are obscure in the definition of riots. I take it, it is not necessary to say they assembled for that purpose, but there must be an unlawful assembly; and as to what act will make a riot, or trespass, such an act as will make a trespass will make a riot. If a number of men assemble with arms, in terrorem populi, though no act is done, it is a riot. If three come out of an alehouse, and go armed, it is a riot.' Coke's definition of riot (3 Inst. 176) is not now accepted. See Field v. Receiver of Metropolitan Police [1907], 2 K.B. 853, 859.

(c) Vide post, p. 410.

force if necessary against any person who may oppose them in the execution of their common purpose; (5) force or violence 'used in the execution of the common purpose, 'not merely used in demolishing (g), but displayed in such a manner as to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage' (h). Unless all these elements are present the offence of riot is not committed.

The definition of riot does not apply to cases in which the law authorises force. In such cases it is not only lawful, but also commendable, to make use of it; as for a justice of the peace, sheriff or constable, or perhaps even for a private person (i), to assemble a competent number of people in order with force to suppress rebels, or enemies, or rioters; and afterwards with such force actually to suppress them (j); or for a justice of peace, who has a just cause to fear a violent resistance, to raise the posse comitatus, in order to remove a force in making an entry into, or detaining of, lands (k). The persons gathered to make such resistance constitute an unlawful assembly. And it is the duty of a sheriff who finds any resistance in the execution of a writ to take with him the posse comitatus, and go in proper person to do execution, and he may arrest the resisters and commit them to prison, and every such resister is guilty of a misdemeanor (l).

The injury or grievance complained of, and intended to be revenged or remedied by a riotous assembly, must relate to some private quarrel only, e.g., pulling down a mill owned by an obnoxious proprietor or procuring the liberation or better treatment of prisoners (m), breaking down inclosures of lands in which the inhabitants of a town claim a right of common, or taking possession of tenements the title whereof is in dispute, or such like matters relating to the interests or disputes of particular persons, in no way concerning the public. The proceedings of a riotous assembly for a public or general purpose, as e.g., to take possession of a town by surprise, terror or force, with the object of carrying out some general political purpose (n), or to pull down all inclosures (o), and also resisting the King's forces, if sent to keep the peace, may amount to overt acts of insurrection, i.e., of high treason by levying war against the King (p).

Riot must be in terrorem populi (q), i.e., in every riot there must be such actual force or violence, or at least such apparent tendency thereto, as would naturally strike terror into the people; as the show of arms, threatening speeches, or turbulent gestures; but it is not necessary that personal violence should be committed (r). It is enough if sufficient force is used to terrify a single person, though no other persons are near enough to be within reach of the alarm. Four persons went to a cottage, in which was one old man; one of them began to knock down the end of the cottage with an axe, and knocked part of the woodwork against the old man; he then caught the old man by the collar, and said, 'Come, you must go out of the house,' and he did go out, and the prisoners pulled the house to the ground, except the chimney; the jury were told that if such force was used by the four prisoners as to terrify the old man, they might find that there was a riot, and this direction was held right (s).

From the absence of terror populi, assemblies at wakes, or other festival times, or meetings for the exercise of common sports or diversions, as wrestling, and such like, are not riotous (t). Three persons or more may assemble together with an intention to execute a wrongful act, and also actually to perform their intended enterprise, without being rioters. Thus, if a man assembles a number of persons to carry away a piece of timber or other thing to which he claims a right, and which cannot be carried away without a number of persons, this will not of itself be a riot if the number of persons are not more than are necessary for the purpose, and if there are no threatening words used, nor any other disturbance of the peace; even though another man has better right to the thing carried away, and the act is therefore wrong and unlawful (u). Where on an indictment for riot it appeared that two men were fighting amidst a great crowd, and that some persons were aiding and assisting; but on some peace officers appearing the fight ceased, and the fighters quietly yielded to the officers: Alderson, B., held that this was not a riot (v). And of course any person may, in a peaceable manner, assemble a fit number of persons to do any lawful thing; as to remove a public nuisance, or a nuisance to his own house or land. And he may do this before any prejudice is received from the nuisance, and may also enter into another man's ground for the purpose. Thus, where a man having erected a weir across a public navigable river, divers persons assembled with spades and other instruments necessary for removing it, and dug a trench in the land of the man who made the weir in order to turn the water and the better to remove the weir, and thus removed the nuisance, it was held not to be a forcible entry nor a riot (w).

(t) 1 Hawk. c. 65, s. 5. Bull baiting, referred to in prior editions, has been illegal since 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 3). In 2 Chit. Cr. L. 494, will be found an indictment said to have been drawn in the year 1797, by a very eminent pleader, for the purpose of suppressing an ancient custom of kicking about foot-balls on Shrove Tuesday, at Kingston-upon-Thames. The first count is for riotously kicking about a foot-ball in the town of Kingston; and the second, for a common nuisance in kicking about a football in the said town. In Sir Antony Ashley's case, 1 Rolle Rep. 109, Coke, C.J., said that stage-players might be indicted for a riot and unlawful assembly. And see Dalt. Just. c. 136 (citing Roll. R.), that if such players by their shows occasion an extraordinary and unusual concourse of people to see them act their tricks, this is an unlawful assembly and riot, for which they may be indicted and fined. 19 Vin. Abr. tit. 'Riots, &c.' (A.) 8.

(u) 1 Hawk. c. 65, s. 5. R. v. Soley, 11 Mod. 117; Dalt. c. 137; Burn's Just. tit. 'Riot,' s. 1.

(v) R. v. Hunt, 1 Cox, 177.

(w) Dalt. c. 137; Burn, tit. 'Riot,' s. 1.

If there be violence and tumult, it makes no difference whether the act intended to be done by the persons assembled is lawful or unlawful. Thus, if three or more persons assist a man to make a forcible entry into lands to which one of them has a good right of entry; or if the like number, in a violent and tumultuous manner, join together in removing a nuisance or other thing, which may be lawfully done in a peaceable manner, they are as much rioters as if the act intended to be done by them were absolutely unlawful (x). And if in removing a nuisance the persons assembled use threats (such as, they will do it though they die for it, or the like), or in any other way behave in actual disturbance of the peace, it seems to be a riot (y). If a large body of men assemble themselves together for the purpose of obtaining any particular end, and conduct themselves in a turbulent manner, either accompanied with acts of violence, or with threats and intimidation calculated to excite the terror and alarm of the King's subjects, this is in itself a riot, whether the end and object proposed be a just and legitimate one or not (z).

The violence and tumult must in some degree be premeditated. If a number of persons, being met together at a fair, market, or any other lawful or innocent occasion, happen on a sudden quarrel to fall together by the ears, they are not guilty of riot, but only of a sudden affray (a), of which none are guilty but those who actually engage in it; because the design of their meeting was innocent and lawful, and the subsequent breach of the peace happened unexpectedly, without any previous intention (b). But although the audience in a public theatre have a right to express the feelings excited by the performance, and to applaud or to hiss any piece which is represented, or any performer who exhibits himself on the stage; yet if a number of persons, having come to the theatre with a predetermined purpose of interrupting the performance, for this purpose make a great noise and disturbance, so as to render the actors entirely inaudible, though without offering personal violence to any individual, or doing any injury to the house, they are guilty of riot (c).

Even though the parties may have assembled in the first instance for an innocent purpose, yet if they afterwards, upon a dispute arising amongst them, form themselves into parties, with promises of mutual assistance, and then make an affray, it is said that they are guilty of a riot, because upon their confederating together with an intention to break the peace, they may as properly be said to be assembled together for that purpose from the time of such confederacy, as if their first coming had been on such a design; and if in an assembly of persons met together on any lawful occasion whatsoever, a sudden proposal is started of going together in a body to pull down a house, or inclosure, or to do any other act of violence, to the disturbance of the public peace, and such motion is agreed to, and executed accordingly, the persons concerned are guilty of riot; because their associating themselves together, for the new purpose, is in no way extenuated by their having met at first upon another (d).

If any person seeing others actually engaged in a riot, joins them and assists them therein, he is as much a rioter as if he had at first assembled with them for the same purpose, inasmuch as he has no pretence that he came innocently into the company, but joined himself to them with an intention of seconding them in the execution of their unlawful enterprise. And it would be endless, as well as superfluous, to examine whether every particular person engaged in a riot were in truth one of the first assembly, or actually had a previous knowledge of the design (e). And if any person encourages, or promotes, or takes part in riots, whether by words, signs, or gestures, or by wearing the badge or ensign of the rioters, he becomes a rioter; for in this case all are principals (f). But mere presence without encouragement is not enough to establish criminality (g). If three or more, being lawfully assembled, quarrel, and the party fall on one of their own company, this is no riot; but if it be on a stranger, the very moment the quarrel begins, they begin to be an unlawful assembly, and their concurrence is evidence of an evil intention in those who concur, so that it is a riot in them that act, and in no more (h). Inciting persons to assemble in a riotous manner seems to be an indictable offence (i), and if the riot ensues in consequence of incitement by speeches at a meeting, the inciter is liable as a principal, although absent from the scene of the actual riot (ii).

The law recognises no right of public meeting in thoroughfares, which are dedicated only for public passage and repassage (j). A place of public resort is analogous to a public thoroughfare, and although public meetings may often have been held in a place of public resort, without interruption by those who have the control of such place, yet there is not in law any right of public meeting there for the purpose of discussing any question, whether social, political, or religious.

A magistrate, being responsible for order in the district over which he has control, and the Commissioner of the Police for the Metropolis being the officer mainly responsible for the preservation of peace and order in the metropolis (k), is fully justified in issuing a public notice to the effect that public meetings will not be permitted to take place in any place of public resort under his control, when he has reasonable grounds for believing that a breach of the public peace is likely to result from holding public meetings in such places. A public meeting held at a place of public resort after the publication of such a notice is not, however, rendered an unlawful assembly merely by reason of such publication (l).

Where the defendants resisted the police by endeavouring to break through their ranks in order to take part in a public meeting in Trafalgar Square, a place of public resort within the metropolis, which meeting had been prohibited by the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis, and the holding of which the police had received orders to prevent, it was held that, by the operation of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 60, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 42, Trafalgar Square is placed under the control and supervision of the police in the same manner as any street, thoroughfare, or public place, and that whether the defendants were guilty of participating in a riotous assembly depended upon whether they, with others who were following them, or who, as they expected, would follow them, approached the square with the intention of holding a meeting, come what might, or merely approached it with the intention of requesting to be allowed to hold a meeting, and of departing if their request was refused.

It was also held, that if the jury were satisfied that the defendants headed a mob with the intention of getting to a place of public resort if they could, and by doing so endangered the public peace and alarmed reasonable people, they would be justified in finding them guilty of riot (m).

B. Statutes as to Riots.

Besides the early statutes for the suppression of riots referred to post, p. 431, the following statutory provisions are in force as to riots :

(i.) The Riot Act.—The Riot Act (1714, 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 5), after reciting that many rebellious riots and tumults had been in divers parts of the kingdom, to the disturbance of the public peace and the endangering of His Majesty's person and government (n), and that the punishments provided by the laws then in being were not adequate to such heinous offences ; for the preventing and suppressing such riots and tumults, and for the more speedy and effectual punishing the offenders, enacts (sect. 1), ' that if any persons to the number of twelve or more, being unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled together, to the disturbance of the public peace, and being required or commanded by any one or more justice or justices of the peace, or by the sheriff of the county, or his under-sheriff, or by the mayor, bailiff or bailiffs, or other head officer, or justice of the peace of any city or town corporate, where such assembly shall be, by proclamation to be made in the King's name, in the form hereinafter directed, to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations or to their lawful business, shall, to the number of twelve or more (notwithstanding such proclamation made), unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously remain or continue together by the space of one hour after such command or request made by proclamation,

(l) R. v. Fursey, 3 St. Tr. (N.S.) 543 ; 6 C. & P. 81 ; where a notice by a Secretary of State, describing an intended public meeting as dangerous to the public peace and illegal, was held not to make the meeting illegal, nor to be any evidence that it was

and then such continuing together to the number of twelve or more, after such command or request made by proclamation, shall be adjudged felony . . . ' (o).

Sect. 2. 'And . . . the order and form of the proclamation that shall be made by the authority of this Act shall be as hereafter followeth (that is to say) : The justice of the peace, or other person authorised by the Act to make the proclamation, shall, among the said rioters, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice command, or cause to be commanded, silence to be while proclamation is making, and after that shall openly and with loud voice make, or cause to be made, proclamation in these words, or like in effect :

“ Our sovereign lord the King chargeth and commandeth all persons being assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the Act made in the first year of King George, for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies.

“ God save the King.”

‘ And every such justice, and justices of the peace, sheriff, mayor, bailiff, and other head officer aforesaid, within the limits of their respective jurisdictions, are hereby authorised and required, on notice or knowledge of any such unlawful, riotous, and tumultuous assembly, to resort to the place where such unlawful, riotous, and tumultuous assembly shall be of persons to the number of twelve or more, and there to make or cause to be made proclamation in manner aforesaid.’

Sect. 3. . . . ‘ If such persons so unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled, or twelve or more of them, after proclamation made in manner aforesaid shall continue together, and not disperse themselves within one hour, it shall be lawful to and for every justice of the peace, sheriff, or under-sheriff of the county where such assembly shall be, and for every high or petty constable or other peace-officer within such county, and also to and for every mayor, justice of the peace, sheriff, bailiff, and other head officer, high or petty constable, and other peace-officer of any city or town corporate where such assembly shall be, and to and for such other persons as shall be commanded to be assisting under any such justice of the peace, sheriff, or under-sheriff, mayor, bailiff, or other head officer (who are hereby authorised to command all His Majesty’s subjects of age and ability to be assisting to them therein) to seize and apprehend, and they are hereby required to seize and apprehend, such persons so unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously continuing together after proclamation made as aforesaid ; and forthwith to carry the persons so apprehended before one or more of His Majesty’s justices of the peace of the county or place where such persons shall be so apprehended, in order to their being proceeded against according to law.’ The section also enacts, that if any of the persons so assembled shall happen to be killed, maimed, or hurt, in the dispersing, seizing,

(o) The rest of the section was repealed in 1888 (S. L. R.). As to present punishment, see post, p. 416, note (v). This section does not affect the common-law offence of riot, but merely aggravates its quality and

or apprehending them, or in the endeavour to do so, by reason of their resisting, then every such justice, &c., constable, or other peace-officer, and all persons being aiding and assisting to them, shall be free, discharged, and indemnified concerning such killing, maiming, or hurting (p).

Sect. 5. 'Provided always . . . that if any person or persons do, or shall, with force and arms, wilfully and knowingly oppose, obstruct, or in any manner wilfully and knowingly let, hinder, or hurt, any person or persons that shall begin to proclaim, or go to proclaim, according to the proclamation hereby directed to be made, whereby such proclamation shall not be made, that then every such opposing, obstructing, letting, hindering, or hurting, such person or persons, so beginning or going to make such proclamation as aforesaid, shall be adjudged felony . . . (q); and that also every such person or persons being so unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled, to the number of twelve, as aforesaid, or more, to whom proclamation should or ought to have been made, if the same had not been hindered, as aforesaid, shall likewise, in case they or any of them, to the number of twelve or more, shall continue together, and not disperse themselves within one hour after such let or hindrance so made, having knowledge of such let or hindrance so made, shall be adjudged felons . . . ' (r).

Sect. 8. 'Provided always, that no person or persons shall be prosecuted by virtue of this Act for any offence or offences committed, contrary to the same, unless such prosecution be commenced (s) within twelve months (t) after the offence committed' (u).

7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 91, recites sects. 1 & 5 of the Riot Act, and provides (sect. 1) that . . . any person convicted of any of the said offences shall not suffer death, but be liable to transportation (v) for life . . . (w).

The Riot Act contains no provisions as to principals in the second degree, or accessories; there may, however, be such principals and accessories (x). Principals in the second degree and accessories before the fact are punishable as principals in the first degree (y); and accessories after the fact are punishable with imprisonment for not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour (z).

is insufficient (a). Where an indictment upon sect. 1, in setting out the proclamation, omits the words 'of the reign of,' which were contained in the proclamation read, this was held a fatal variance (b). But it is submitted that the proclamation may now simply refer to the Act by its short title, 'The Riot Act' (c). The hour is computed from the first reading of the proclamation. Where, therefore, a magistrate read the proclamation a second and third time before an hour had elapsed from the time of his reading it the first time, and it was objected that the second and third readings must be considered as new warnings, and as if the former readings were abandoned, it was held that the second, or any subsequent reading of the proclamation, did not at all do away with the effect of the first reading, and that the hour was to be computed from the time of the first reading of the proclamation (b).

If there be such an assembly that there would have been a riot, if the parties had carried their purpose into effect, it is within the Act (b).

Upon an indictment under sect. 1, it was not proved that the prisoner was among the mob during the whole of the hour, but he was proved to have been there at various times during the hour. It was held that it was a question for the jury, upon all the circumstances, whether he did substantially continue making part of the assembly for the hour; for although he might have occasion to separate himself for a minute or two, yet if in substance he was there during the hour he would not be thereby excused (d).

A riot is not the less a riot, nor an illegal meeting the less an illegal meeting, because the Riot Act has not been read, the effect of the reading being to make the parties guilty of a statutory offence if they do not disperse within an hour; but if the proclamation be not read, the common law offence remains (e).

By sect. 3 'If any seaman, caster, ship-carpenter, or other person shall be convicted of any of the offences aforesaid, in pursuance of this Act, and shall afterwards offend again in like manner, every such seaman, &c., so offending again in like manner, and being lawfully convicted thereof . . . shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall be transported to some of His Majesty's dominions beyond the seas for any space of time or term of years not exceeding fourteen years, nor less than seven years' (g). By sect. 4, the Act does not extend to any act, deed, &c., done in the service, or by the authority of His Majesty (h). By sect. 7, offences committed on the high seas are triable in any session of Oyer and Terminer, &c., for the trial of offences committed on the high seas within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England (i). By virtue of the proviso to sect. 12 infra, the jury may, on an indictment under sect. 11, find the accused guilty of an offence under sect. 12 : or they may, under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, find him guilty of common-law riot (m).

By sect. 12, 'If any persons, riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, shall unlawfully and with force injure or damage any such church, chapel, meeting-house, place of divine worship, house, stable, coach-house, out-house, warehouse, office, shop, mill, malt-house, hop-oast, barn, granary, shed, hovel, fold, building, erection, machinery, engine, staith, bridge, waggon-way, or trunk, as is in the last preceding section mentioned, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . . (n).

Provided that if upon the trial of any person for any felony in the last preceding section mentioned the jury shall not be satisfied that such person is guilty thereof, but shall be satisfied that he is guilty of any offence in this section mentioned, then the jury may find him guilty thereof, and he may be punished accordingly' (o).

The following decisions on 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 30, s. 8 (rep.), are still of value in the interpretation of sects. 11 and 12 of the Act of 1861. In the absence of a definition of riot in sect. 8, the common-law definition of a riot was resorted to, and where any one of His Majesty's subjects was terrified this it was held was a sufficient terror and alarm to substantiate that part of the charge (p).

If persons riotously assembled and demolished a house, really believing that it was the property of one of them, and acted bonâ fide in the assertion of a supposed right, this was not a felonious demolition of the house within sect. 8, even though there were a riot (q). It is not necessary that the rioters should have any ill-will against the person whose property is destroyed, &c., demolished (r).

If rioters, after proceeding a certain length, leave off of their own accord before the act of demolition be completed, a jury may infer that they did not intend to demolish the house. A party of rioters came to a house about midnight, and in a riotous manner burst open the door, broke some of the furniture, all the windows, and one of the window-frames, and then went away, there being nothing to hinder them from doing more damage ; it was held that, although the breaking and damage done was a sufficient beginning to demolish the house, yet unless the jury were satisfied that the ultimate object was to destroy the house, and that if they had carried their intentions into full effect, they would, in point of fact, have demolished it, it was not a beginning to demolish within sect. 8 (s).

The fact that the rioters' main object was to injure a person did not take a case out of sect. 8 if they also meant to demolish his house.

A party of coal-whippers having a feeling of ill-will to a coal-lumper, who paid less than the usual wages, created a mob, riotously went to the house where his pay-table was, cried out that they would murder him, threw stones, brick-bats, &c., broke windows and partitions, and threw down part of a wall in a yard, and continued, after his escape, throwing stones at the house, till they were compelled to desist by the threats of the police; it was held that this case was distinguishable from R. v. Thomas (s), because the mob did not leave off voluntarily, but after the threats of the police, and that they might be convicted of beginning to demolish the house, though their principal object was to injure the lumper, provided it was also their object to demolish the house (t).

Where on an indictment for 'beginning' to demolish a building used for trade, it appeared that the prisoners began by breaking the windows and doors, and having afterwards entered the house, they set fire to the furniture, but that no part of the house was burnt. Parke, J., told the jury 'beginning to pull down means not simply a demolition of a part, but a part with an intent to demolish the whole. It is for you to say if the prisoners meant to stop where they did, and do no more; because if they did, they are not guilty; but if they intended, when they broke the windows and doors, to go farther, and destroy the house, then they are guilty of a capital offence. If they had the full means of going farther, and were not interrupted, but left off of their own accord, it is evidence from which you may judge that they meant the work of demolition to stop where it did. If you think that they originally came there without intent to demolish, and the setting fire to the furniture was an afterthought but with that intent, then you must acquit, because no part of the house having been burnt, there was no beginning to destroy the house. If they came originally without such intent, but had afterwards set fire to the house, then the offence would be arson. If you have doubts whether they originally came with a purpose to demolish, you may use the setting fire to the furniture under such circumstances, and in such manner, as that the necessary consequence, if not for timely interference, would have been the burning of the house, as evidence to shew that they had such intent, although they began to demolish in another manner' (u). Upon an indictment under sect. 8, the jury could not convict unless they were satisfied that the prisoners intended to leave the house no house at all in fact; for if they intended to leave it still a house, though in a state however dilapidated, they were not guilty of the offence. To have left off the work of devastation without interruption would lead to the inference that the prisoners did not intend to destroy the house; but even if they were interrupted, the question still remained, what was their ultimate intention? If they had been some time at their work of ruin before they were interrupted, it was for the jury to say, looking to the nature of the things which they had destroyed, whether their purpose was to demolish the house itself (v).

Although setting fire to a house is a substantive felony, yet if fire is made the means of attempting to destroy a house, it is as much a beginning to demolish as if any other mode of destruction were resorted to, and the indictment may be for that offence (w).

If a person forms part of a riotous assembly at the time the act of demolition commences, or if he wilfully joins such riotous assembly, so as to co-operate with them whilst the act of demolition is going on, and before it is completed, in either case he comes within the description of the offence, although he may not have assisted with his own hand in the demolition of the building (x). On an indictment under 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 30, s. 8 (rep.), it appeared that a house was demolished by rioters by means of fire, which was lighted before one o'clock in the night, and there was no evidence to shew that the prisoner was present at the time when the house was set on fire, but it was proved that he was there between two and three o'clock whilst the house was burning, and whilst the mob, who set it on fire, were still there; it was held that the prisoner was properly convicted as a principal. For although it was possible, if this had been an indictment for burning the house, that the prisoner could not have been convicted as a principal, yet this was an offence under an enactment that made it felony if persons riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, and when so assembled destroyed a house; therefore it was not simply the fact of destroying a house by fire, but it was the combined fact of riotously assembling together and whilst the riot continued demolishing the house. To make a party guilty of that, he must be shewn to be one of those who were present at the offence, or he could not be aiding or abetting. But as it was not only the burning, but also the riotously assembling together, the whole of the prisoner's conduct on that day was left to the jury; and it was distinctly left to them that unless they were satisfied that the prisoner had by his language excited the mob to the act which was the subject-matter of the inquiry, and afterwards been present at it, he was not guilty (y).

Under 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 30, s. 8 (rep.), it was a sufficient demolishing of the house by rioters if it were so far destroyed as to be no longer a house; and the fact that the rioters left the chimney standing made no difference (z).

In order to prove that there was a beginning to demolish the house, it must be proved that some part of the freehold was destroyed; it was not therefore sufficient to prove that the window shutters were demolished (a).

There have been few direct rulings as to the offences created by sects. 11 and 12 of the Act of 1861, but it would seem to be clear that malicious injury to property done by three or more is not in itself a riot (b): that to constitute an offence within the sections there must be also a riot in the common-law sense of the term (c). It has been held that demolition of boundary-wall of an empty house by a gang of rough youths was not a demolition by persons riotously and tumultuously assembled so as to warrant a claim for compensation under the Riot Damages Act, 1886 (d), there being no evidence of any intention of members of the gang to help each other, if need arose, in the execution of their common purpose nor of any force or violence (other than that used in demolishing the wall) displayed in such a manner as to alarm any person of reasonable firmness and courage (e); and to constitute an offence against sect. 11 there must be an intent totally to demolish the house, &c. (f).

SECT. II.—ROUTS.

In some books the notion of a roul is limited to assemblies occasioned by some grievance common to all the company: as the inclosure of land in which they all claim a right of common, &c. But, according to the general opinion, it seems to be a disturbance of the peace by three or more persons assembling together with an intention to do a thing, which, if executed, will make them rioters, and actually making a motion to execute their purpose. In fact, it agrees in all particulars with a riot except that it may be complete without the execution of the intended enterprise (g). And it seems, by the recitals in several early statutes, that if people assemble themselves, and afterwards proceed, ride, go forth, or move by instigation of one or several conducting them, this is a roul; inasmuch as they move and proceed in roul and number (h).

It is usual to insert in indictments for riot the word 'routously'; and if a riot is not proved, the jury may in such indictment convict of roul. The offence is an indictable misdemeanor, punishable by fine (or) imprisonment without hard labour, or both (gg). Indictments for roul alone are rarely, if ever, preferred.

SECT. III.—UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY AND ASSOCIATION.

A. Common Law.

An unlawful assembly, according to the common opinion, is a disturbance of the peace by persons assembling together with an intention to do a thing which, if it were executed, would make them rioters, but neither actually executing it nor making a motion towards its execution. Hawkins, however, thinks this opinion much too narrow; and that any meeting of great numbers of people with such circumstances of terror as cannot but endanger the public peace, and raise fears and jealousies among the King's subjects, seems properly to be called an unlawful assembly. As where great numbers complaining of a common grievance meet together, armed in a warlike manner (i) in order to consult together concerning the most proper means for the recovery of their interests: for no one can foresee what may be the event of such an assembly (j). In substance this means that an assembly is unlawful if it may reasonably be found that it will endanger the public peace: 'if a mutiny from its general appearance and accompanying circumstances is calculated to excite terror, alarm, and consternation it is generally criminal and unlawful' (k). And 'any meeting assembled under such circumstances as, according to the opinion of rational and firm men are likely to produce danger to the tranquillity and peace of the neighbourhood, is an unlawful assembly' (l). In viewing this question, the jury should take into consideration the way in which the meetings were held, the hour at which they met, and the language used by the persons assembled, and by those who addressed them: and then consider whether firm and rational men, having their families and property there, would have reasonable ground to fear a breach of the peace, as the alarm must not be merely such as would frighten any foolish or timid person, but must be such as would alarm persons of reasonable firmness and courage (m). All persons who join an assembly of this kind, disregarding its probable effect and the alarm and consternation which are likely to ensue, and all who give countenance and support to it, are criminally responsible as parties to the assembly (n).

The difference between riot and unlawful assembly is this: if the parties assemble in a tumultuous manner calculated to cause terror, and actually execute their purpose with violence, it is a riot; but if they merely assemble upon a purpose which, if executed, would make them rioters, but do not execute or make any motions to create such purpose and having done nothing, separate without carrying their purpose into effect, it is an unlawful assembly (o).

An assembly of a man's friends for the defence of his person against those who threaten to beat him if he go to a market, &c., is unlawful; for he who is in fear of such insults must provide for his safety by swearing the peace against the persons by whom he is threatened, and must not make use of violent methods, which cannot but be attended with the danger of raising tumults and disorders to the disturbance of the public peace (p). But an assembly of a man's friends in his own house, for the defence of the possession of it against persons who threaten to make an unlawful entry, or for the defence of his person against persons who threaten to beat him in his house, is indulged by law; for a man's house is looked upon as his castle (q). It is said, however, that he may not arm himself and assemble his friends in defence of his close (r).

An assembly of persons to witness a prize fight or bull fight, cock fight, or badger baiting (s), is an unlawful assembly, and every one present and countenancing the fight is guilty of an offence (t). Where sixteen persons, with their faces blackened, and armed with guns and sticks, met at a house at night, intending to go out for the purpose of night poaching, it was held, that it was impossible that a meeting to go out with their faces thus disguised, at night, and under such circumstances, could be other than an unlawful assembly (u).

An assembly in a public place for a lawful purpose, and with no intention of carrying out such purpose in an unlawful manner, is not rendered unlawful by the fact that those who compose it meet with the knowledge that it is likely to be attacked or resisted by others (v).

A conspiracy between several persons to meet together for the purpose of disturbing the peace and tranquillity of the realm, of exciting discontent and disaffection, and of exciting the King's subjects to hatred of the government and constitution is indictable, but independently of any question of conspiracy, treason, or sedition, such assembly appears to be unlawful (w).

Unlawful assembly is an indictable misdemeanor punishable at common law by fine and (or) imprisonment without hard labour.

II. st. 1., c. 5 (1662), after reciting the mischiefs of tumultuous petitioning, enacts (sect. 1) that no person shall 'solicit, labour, or procure the getting of hands or other consent of any persons above the number of twenty, to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration or other addresses to the King or both or either houses of Parliament, for alteration of matters established by law in church or state, unless the matter thereof shall have been first consented unto and ordered' by three or more justices, or by the

Where an indictment alleged that there was an unlawful meeting of the defendant and of divers other persons unknown, for the purpose of unlawfully practising military exercise, and which persons so met and assembled were there without any lawful authority of the Queen, &c., and that the defendant was present at and unlawfully did attend the said meeting for the purpose of unlawfully training and drilling divers persons unknown to the practice of military exercise; Maule, J., held that the indictment was not bad for charging two offences (c).

An indictment upon this Act should aver that the meeting was for the purpose of training and drilling, or of being trained and drilled to the use of arms, or for the purpose of practising military exercises, movements, or evolutions, and that the meeting was held without any lawful authority from His Majesty, or the lieutenant, or two justices of the peace, &c., by commission or otherwise (d).

Meetings within a Mile of Parliament when sitting.—The Seditious Meetings Act, 1817 (57 Geo. III. c. 19), contains certain enactments relating to meetings and assemblies of persons which are still in force (e).

Sect. 23, after reciting that it is highly inexpedient that public meetings or assemblies should be held near the houses of Parliament, or near the courts of justice in Westminster Hall, on certain days, enacts, that it shall not be lawful for any person to convene or call together, or to give any notice for convening or calling together, any meeting consisting of more than fifty persons, or for any number of persons exceeding fifty to meet in any street, square, or open place, in the city or liberties of Westminster, or county of Middlesex, within the distance of a mile from the gate of Westminster Hall (except such parts of the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, as are within the said distance), for the purpose or on the pretext of considering of or preparing any petition, &c., for alteration of matters in Church or State, on any day on which the two houses, or either house of Parliament, shall meet and sit . . . nor on any day on which the courts shall sit in Westminster Hall (f): and that if any meeting or assembly for such purposes or on such pretexts shall be assembled or holden on such day, it shall be deemed an unlawful assembly. But there is a proviso that the enactment shall not apply to any meeting for the election of members of Parliament, or to persons attending upon the business of either house of Parliament, or any of the said courts (g).

(b) S. 2 provides for the dispersion of persons so assembled by justices of the peace, constables, or peace officers or persons acting in their aid and assistance, and for arresting and detaining or holding to bail such offenders. By s. 7 prosecutions for offences against the provisions of the Act must be commenced within six months after the offence committed. S. 4 makes the Act alternative to other criminal remedies (vide ante, pp. 4, 6. Ss. 5, 6 were repealed in 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61). S. 8 was repealed in 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 91).

The rest of the Act, so far as unrepealed, relates to unlawful combinations and confederacies (see p. 335), except s. 35, which declares that nothing in the Act shall take away, abridge, or affect any law of the realm for the suppression or punishment of any offence named therein (vide ante, pp. 4, 5).

(f) It is doubtful whether this applies to the sittings at the Royal Courts of Justice.

(g) S. 24 was repealed in 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 33).

SECT. IV.—AFFRAYS.

Common Law.—An affray is the fighting of two or more persons in a public place, to the terror of His Majesty's subjects, and is a misdemeanor at common law (h). It differs from riot in that it may be committed by two persons (i). By public place seems to be meant a street or highway, or other place where the public may pass or be as of right (j). Where two of the prisoners fought together amidst a great crowd of persons, and the others were present aiding and assisting, at a place far from any highway, and the fight ceased on the appearance of some peace-officers, it was held that this was not an affray, because the scene of action was to all intents and purposes a private place (k). A gathering for such a fight or a prize fight is clearly an unlawful assembly, and where there is resistance to lawful authority exercised for the purpose of putting a stop to it, the offence may amount to an affray, or even a riot (l). An affray may fall short of a riot, though many persons are engaged in it. Thus, if a number of persons met together at a fair or market, or on any other lawful or innocent occasion, happen on a sudden quarrel to fall together by the ears, they will not be guilty of riot, but only of a sudden affray, of which none are guilty but those who actually engage in it; because the design of their meeting was innocent and lawful, and the subsequent breach of the peace happened unexpectedly without any previous intention (m).

An affray may be aggravated by the circumstances under which it takes place or by its dangerous tendency; where persons coolly and deliberately engage in a duel which must be attended by the risk of murder, this is not only an open defiance of the law, but carries with it a direct contempt of the justice of the nation, putting men under the necessity of righting themselves (n). And it is an aggravated form of affray violently to disturb the officers of justice in the due execution of their office, by the rescue of a person legally arrested, or the attempt to make such a rescue (o). An affray is severely punishable when committed in the King's Courts, or even in the palace yard near those Courts; and it is highly finable even when made in the presence of an inferior Court of justice (p). As to affrays in a church or churchyard, vide ante, p. 401.

It is said that no quarrelsome or threatening words whatsoever

Inst. 158, it is said that an affray is a public offence to the terror of the King's subjects; and is an English word, and so called because it affrighteth and maketh men afraid; and that it is inquirable in a leet as a common nuisance.

amount to an affray (q), and that no one can justify laying his hands on those who barely quarrel with angry words, without coming to blows : but it seems that a constable may, at the request of the party threatened, carry the person who threatens to beat him before a justice, in order to find sureties. And though mere words cannot in law create such terror as to constitute an affray, yet there may be an affray without actual violence ; as where persons arm themselves with dangerous and unusual weapons, in such a manner as will naturally cause terror to the people, which is said to be an offence at common law (r).

Statute.—The Statute of Northampton (2 Edw. III. c. 3) enacts, that ‘ no man, great or small, of what condition soever, except the King’s servants in his presence, and his ministers in executing of the King’s precepts or of their office, and such as be in their company assisting them, and also upon a cry made for arms to keep the peace (armes de pees), and the same in such places where such acts do happen (s), be so hardy to come before the King’s justices or other of the King’s ministers doing their office, with force and arms, nor bring no force in affray of peace (t), nor to go nor ride armed, by night nor by day, in fairs or markets, nor in the presence of the King’s justices, or other ministers, nor in no part elsewhere ; upon pain to forfeit their armour to the King, and their bodies to prison at the King’s pleasure. And that the King’s justices in their presence, sheriffs, and other ministers in their bailiwicks, lords of franchises and their bailiffs in the same, and mayors and bailiffs of cities and boroughs within the cities and boroughs, and borough-holders, constables, and wardens of the peace within their wards, shall have power to execute this Act (u). And that the justices assigned at their coming down into the country shall have power to inquire how such officers and lords have exercised their offices, and to punish them whom they find that have not done that which pertained to their office’ (v).

The wearing of arms is not punishable under this statute unless it be accompanied with such circumstances as are apt to terrify the people ; from whence it seems clearly to follow, that persons of quality are in no danger of offending against the statute by wearing common weapons, or having their usual number of attendants with them for their ornament or defence, in such places, and upon such occasions, in which it is the common fashion to make use of them, without causing the least suspicion of an intention to commit any act of violence, or disturbance of the peace (w). And no person is within the statute who arms himself to

(t) The words of the statute are ‘ en effrai de la pees ’ [paix]. In another part of the statute ‘ armes de pees ’ clearly means ‘ arms to keep the peace.’ Coke, 3 Inst. 158, cites the words as ‘ en effraier de la pais,’ and reads the latter word as ‘ pays ’ in disregard of its gender.

(u) Offences within this statute were specifically mentioned in the old form of the commission of the peace settled in 30 Eliz.

(v) Two early statutes enforcing this Act have been repealed, viz., 7 Rich. II. c. 13 (in 1857), and 20 Rich. II. c. 1 (in 1863 as to England, and in 1872 as to Ireland). A statute of 1313 (7 Edw. II.) requires persons to come to Parliament, ‘ without force and without armour, well, and peaceably.’

(w) 1 Hawk. c. 63, s. 9.

suppress dangerous rioters, rebels, or enemies, and endeavours to suppress or resist such disturbers of the peace and quiet of the realm (x). But a man cannot excuse wearing such armour in public by alleging that a person threatened him, and that he wears it for the safety of his person from the assault: though no one incurs the penalty of the statute by assembling his neighbours and friends in his own house, against those who threaten to do him any violence therein, because a man's house is as his castle (y). In R. v. Meade (z), a single person who went armed in the streets without lawful occasion, or so acted as to be a nuisance and terror to the public, was convicted under this statute.

Punishment.—The punishment of affrays at common law or under 2 Edw. III. c. 3, is by fine and (or) imprisonment without hard labour. The term of imprisonment and the amount of the fine are in the discretion of the Court (a).

As to the powers and duties of officials and private persons to stop affrays, see post, p. 431.

SECT. V.—INDICTMENT, EVIDENCE AND PUNISHMENT.

Indictment.—An indictment for riot, rout, or unlawful assembly must shew that there was an unlawful assembly of more than two persons (b). It is not clear whether it is now necessary that an indictment for riot should contain the words 'to the terror of the people' (c). Where the indictment is aptly drawn the defendants if acquitted of riot may be convicted of rout or of unlawful assembly if the facts so warrant. Where six persons were indicted for a riot, two of them died without being tried, two were acquitted, and the other two were found guilty. The Court refused to arrest the judgment, saying, that as the jury had found two persons to be guilty of a riot, it must have been together with those two who had never been tried, as it could not otherwise have been a riot (d). But two persons only cannot be guilty of a riot (e). Where the offence was specially laid as a riot, the riotosè extending to all the facts, and stated a battery of an individual as part of the riot: it was held that an acquittal of the riot was an acquittal on the whole indictment. But it was also held, that if the indictment had been, that the defendants, with divers other disturbers of the peace, had committed this riot and battery, the defendants might have been found guilty of the battery (f).

(c) 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24, makes formal conclusions unnecessary. In R. v. Hughes [1830], 4 C. & P. 373; 6 St. Tr. (N. S.) 1101, Park, J., held such conclusion necessary at common law. But in R. v. Cox [1831], 4 C. & P. 538, Patteson, J., held that on an indictment for riot without such conclusion, but charging the cutting down of fences a conviction could be had for unlawful assembly. It is not, however, clear that the words are in reality a formal conclusion. They may fairly be treated an essential part of the description of the offence. See Field v. Receiver of Metrop. Police [1907], 2 K.B. 853. An indictment under s. 1 of the Riot Act never needed this conclusion. R. v. James [1831], 5 C. & P. 153, and MS. C. S. G., per Patteson, J.

Where several were indicted for a riot, it was moved, that the prosecutor might name two or three, and try it against them, and that the rest might enter into a rule to plead not guilty (guilty if the others were found guilty); and as a rule was made accordingly; this being to prevent the expense of putting them all to plead (g).

Evidence.—In substance the rules as to admissibility of evidence in cases of riot, rout, or unlawful assembly are the same as in cases of conspiracy, the offences like that offence involving concerted action (h). Upon an indictment against H. and others, for a conspiracy and unlawful meeting together with persons unknown, for the purpose of exciting discontent and disaffection, at which meeting H. was the chairman, it was held that resolutions passed at a former meeting assembled a short time before, in a distant place, at which H. also presided, and the avowed object of which meeting was the same as that of the meeting mentioned in the indictment, were admissible in evidence, to show the intention of H. in assembling and attending the meeting in question. And it was also held that a copy of these resolutions delivered by H., to the witness at the time of the former meeting, as the resolutions then intended to be proposed and which corresponded with those which the witness heard read from a written paper, was admissible, without producing the original (i).

In the same case it appeared that large bodies of men had come to the meeting in question from a distance, marching in regular order resembling a military march; and it was held to be admissible evidence, to shew the character and intention of the meeting, that within two days of the time at which it took place considerable numbers were seen training and drilling before daybreak, at a place from which one of these bodies had come to the meeting, and that, upon their discovering the persons who saw them, they ill-treated them, and forced one of them to take an oath never to be a king's man again. And it was also admitted as evidence for the same purpose, that another body of men in their progress to the meeting, on passing the house of the person who had been so ill-treated, expressed their disapprobation of his conduct by hissing (j).

It was decided in the same case that parol evidence of inscriptions and devices on banners and flags displayed at a meeting was admissible without producing the originals (k), but that upon the indictment in question evidence of the supposed misconduct of those who dispersed the meeting was not admissible (l).

Where the question was, with what intention a great number of persons assembled to drill, declarations made by those assembled and in the act of drilling, and further declarations made by others who were proceeding to the place, and solicitations made by them to others to accompany them declaratory of their object, were held to be admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing their object (m). And in general, evidence is admissible to show that the meeting caused alarm and apprehension, and to prove information given to the civil authorities, and the measures taken by them in consequence of such information (n).

It was held, that the prisoners must first be identified as forming part of the crowd before the riot is proved (o). But this is a very inconvenient course, causing much waste of time by recalling witnesses; and it has since been held that on an indictment for riot the prosecutor is entitled to prove the acts of any rioters before he connects the others with the riot (p), and this is in conformity with the practice in cases of conspiracy (q).

Punishment.—(1) Riot.—Riot at common law is an indictable misdemeanor punishable by fine and (or) imprisonment without hard labour (r).

By the Hard Labour Act, 1822 (3 Geo. IV., c. 114) (s), on conviction of riot the Court may impose a sentence of imprisonment with hard labour in addition to or in lieu of any punishment which could be inflicted before 1822 (t). This statute does not apply to felonious riot. The punishment for statutory offences in relation to riot are stated under the statutes (ante, pp. 414–416). Common-law riot is triable at quarter sessions (u); offences under sects. 1–5 of the Riot Act are not so triable (v).

(2) Routs, Unlawful Assemblies, and Affrays.—These offences are misdemeanors punishable at common law by fine or imprisonment without hard labour or both (vide ante, p. 249), and triable at quarter sessions (u).

SECT. VI.—SUPPRESSION OF RIOTS, &c.

The powers and duties of public officers and private persons with reference to the suppression of unlawful assemblies, affrays, routs, and riots, rest partly on the common law and partly on statutes.

On the constitution of the office of justices of the peace (34 Edw. III. c. 1) they were given power to restrain rioters and all other barrators, and to pursue, arrest, take, and chastise them according to their trespass and offence, and to cause them to be imprisoned and duly punished according to the law and customs of the realm (w). This statute has been construed as authorising a single justice to arrest, or by parol command to authorise the arrest, of persons riotously assembled. Those early statutes, still unrepealed, were passed for the suppression of riots (x), (o) So ruled by Vaughan, Parke and Alderson, BB., on the special commission of 1830 at Salisbury, and approved by all the judges. Per Alderson, B., in R. v. Nicholson, 1 Lew. 300, where the same course was adopted.

(x) Their immediate object is said to have been to compel sheriffs and others to put the law in force against Lollards and other organisations of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Wright's Report on Criminal Law (Parl. Pap., 1878, H.L. No. 178), p. 29. See 1 Hawk. c. 65, s. 14 et seq. Burn's Justice (30th ed.), tit. 'Riot.' R. v. Gulston, 2 Ld. Raym. 1210.

17 Rich. II. c. 8 (1393) (y), 13 Hen. IV. c. 7 (1411) (z), and 2 Hen. V. st. 1 c. 8 (1414) (a). The first two require the use of the posse comitatus (b) by the sheriff, &c., in cases of riot, rout, and unlawful assembly, and authorise the arrest of offenders and the recording of offences committed in the presence of the justices. The third provides for the case of default by justices in enforcing the Act of 1411, and prescribes punishments for great and petty riots and for neglecting to aid in suppressing riot. And it has been held to be an indictable misdemeanor to refuse to aid a constable in suppressing a riot or affray (c). The duties of private persons in such cases were thus expounded by Tindal, C.J., in his charge to the grand jury in the case of the Bristol Riots (d), as follows: 'By the common law every private person may lawfully endeavour of his own authority, and without any warrant or sanction of the magistrate, to suppress a riot by every means in his power. He may disperse, or assist in dispersing, those who are assembled; he may stay those who are engaged in it from executing their purpose (e); he may stop and prevent others whom he shall see coming up from joining the rest; and not only has he the authority, but it is his bounden duty as a good subject of the King to perform this to the utmost of his ability. If the riot be general and dangerous, he may arm himself against the evil doers to keep the peace (f). Such was the opinion of the judges of England in the time of Queen Elizabeth, "the case of Arms" (g), although the judges add that it would "be more discreet for everyone in such a case to attend and be assistant to the justices, sheriffs, and other ministers of the King in the doing of it." It would undoubtedly be more advisable so to do; for the presence and authority of the magistrate would restrain the proceeding to such extremities until the danger were sufficiently immediate, or until some felony was either committed, or could not be prevented without recourse to arms; and at all events the assistance given by men who act in subordination and concert with the civil magistrate will be more effectual to attain the object proposed than any efforts, however well intended, of separated and disunited individuals. But if the occasion demands immediate action, and no opportunity is given for procuring the advice or sanction of the magistrate, it is the duty of every subject to act for himself, and upon his own responsibility in suppressing a riotous and tumultuous assembly; and he may be assured that whatever is honestly done by him in the execution of that object will be supported and justified by the common law.' This charge was approved in Phillips v. Eyre (h).

The duties of officers as to the suppression of rioters are thus laid down by Tindal, C.J., in the Bristol Riots case (i). ‘Still further, by the common law, not only is each private subject bound to exert himself to the utmost, but every sheriff, constable, and other peace-officer, is called upon to do all that in them lies for the suppression of riot, and each has authority to command all other subjects of the King to assist him in that undertaking. By an early statute, which is still in force (13 Hen. IV. c. 7) (j), any two justices, with the sheriff or under-sheriff of the county, may come with the power of the county, if need be, to arrest any rioters, and shall arrest them; and they have power to record that which they see done in their presence against the law; by which record the offenders shall be convicted (k), and may afterwards be brought to punishment. And here I must distinctly observe, that it is not left to the choice or will of the subject, as some have erroneously supposed, to attend or not to the call of the magistrate, as they think proper, but every man is bound when called upon, under pain of fine and imprisonment, to yield a ready and implicit obedience to the call of the magistrate and to do his utmost in assisting him to suppress any tumultuous assembly’ (l). For in the succeeding reign another statute (2 Hen. V., st. 1, c. 8) was passed which enacts that the King’s liege people being sufficient to travel in the counties where such routs, assemblies, or riots shall be, shall be assistant to the justices, commissioners, and sheriffs, and other officers upon reasonable warning (m), to ride with them in aid to resist such riots, routs, and assemblies on pain of imprisonment and to make fine and ransom to the King (n). In later times the course has been for the magistrate on occasions of actual riot and confusion, to call in the aid of such persons as he thought necessary, and to swear them in as special constables; and in order to prevent any doubt, if doubt could exist, the statute 1 Geo. IV. c. 37, and (since that has been repealed by the statute 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 41) (o) the statute last referred to has invested the magistrate with that power in direct and express terms when tumult, riot, or felony was only likely to take place or might reasonably be apprehended.’ The magistrates may also call in the aid of the local militia (p), the yeomanry (q), and the reserve forces (r), and the territorial army (s), and may obtain on requisition the aid of the regular army (t). militia and reserve and territorial forces, when called out in aid of the civil power, are subject to military law (u).

The powers and duties of magistrates and police to disperse riots, &c., do not depend on the making of the proclamation to disperse, the provisions of the Riot Act being in aid, and not in supersession, of the common law (v), and where the Riot Act has been read it does not interrupt or suspend such powers and duties during the following hour (w).

In R. v. Kennett (x), the Lord Mayor of London was tried in 1780 for neglect of duty during the Gordon Riots by not reading the Riot Act and releasing prisoners.

Upon an information against the Mayor of Bristol for neglect of duty in not suppressing the Bristol riots in 1831, which was tried at bar, it was laid down that the general rules of law require of magistrates that at the time of riots they should keep the peace, restrain the rioters, and pursue and take them; and to enable them to do this, they may call on all the King's subjects to assist them, which they are bound to do upon reasonable warning; and in point of law, a magistrate would be justified in giving firearms to those who thus came to assist him, but it would be imprudent in him to give them to those who might not know their use, and who might be under no control, and who, not being used to act together, might be cut off from the rest of the force, and the arms, by those means, get into the hands of the rioters (y).

It is no part of the duty of a magistrate to go out and head the constables, or to marshal and arrange them; neither is it any part of his duty to hire men to assist him in putting down a riot; nor to keep a body of men, as a reserve, to act as occasion may require; nor is it any part of his duty to give any orders respecting the firearms in gunsmiths' shops. Nor is a magistrate bound to ride with the military: if he gives the military officer orders to act, that is all that is required of him (z).

The justices have also powers, if a riot is apprehended or is proceeding, to adjourn elections (a), or to close theatres (b), or public houses (c).

Military Forces of the Crown.—With respect to the powers, duties, and responsibilities of soldiers in the suppression of riots, Tindal, C.J., in the Bristol Riots case (d) thus stated the law: 'The law acknowledges no distinction in this respect between the soldier and the private individual. The soldier is still a citizen, lying under the same obligation, and invested with the same authority to preserve the peace of the King as any other subject (e). If the one is bound to attend the call of the civil magistrate, so is the other; if the one may interfere for that purpose when the occasion demands it, without the requisition of the magistrate, so may the other too; if the one may employ arms for that purpose, when arms are necessary, the soldier may do the same. Undoubtedly the same exercise of discretion which requires the private subject to act in subordination to and in aid of the magistrate, rather than upon his own authority, before recourse is had to arms, ought to operate in a stronger degree with a military force. But where the danger is pressing and immediate, where a felony has actually been committed, or cannot otherwise be prevented, and from the circumstances of the case no opportunity is offered of obtaining a requisition from the proper authorities (f), the military subjects of the King not only may, but are bound to do their utmost, of their own authority, to prevent the perpetration of outrage, to put down riot and tumult, and to preserve the lives and property of the people.'

The law as laid down in this charge was adopted in the Report on the Featherstone Riots (g), where it is said that 'a soldier for the purpose of establishing civil order is only a citizen armed in a particular manner. He cannot, because he is a soldier, excuse himself if, without necessity, he takes human life. A soldier can only act by using his arms. The weapons he carries are deadly. They cannot be employed at all without danger to life, and in these days of improved rifles and perfected ammunition, without some risk of injuring distant and possibly innocent bystanders. . . . The whole action of the military when called in ought to be based on the principle of doing, and doing without fear, that which is absolutely necessary to prevent serious crime, and of exercising all care and skill with regard to what is done; and the presence of a magistrate, while expedient, is not in the least necessary to entitle the military to act, even by firing, to prevent felonious outrage or dangerous riot' (h).

From the right to suppress riots flows the right to use such force as is reasonably necessary to disperse the rioters assembled (i). The degree of force which may be used depends on the nature of the riot, and must always be moderated and proportioned to the circumstances of the case, and to the end to be obtained. The taking of life can only be justified by the necessity of protecting persons or property against various forms of violent crime, or by the necessity of dispersing a riotous crowd which is dangerous unless dispersed, or in the case of persons whose conduct has been felonious, through disobedience to the provisions of the Riot Act (j), and who resist by force the attempt to disperse and apprehend them (k).

Unlawful Assemblies.—What has been above stated as to riots is also applicable to unlawful assemblies, even when no act of violence has been committed (l), subject to the qualification that unless such assembly is calculated to cause a serious breach of the peace, the action of officers of the law or private persons towards its suppression must be limited to what is reasonably needed to prevent a disturbance. The officers of the law may order such assembly to disperse, arrest those who refuse to disperse, stop others from joining them, and if resisted, use force to compel obedience (m). Such resistance, if concerted, might amount to riot (n).

Affrays.—Any person who sees others engaged in a fight or affray may arrest them while still engaged in the fight, and detain them till their passion has cooled and their desire to break the peace has ceased, and then deliver them to a peace-officer; and so any person may arrest an affrayer after the actual violence is over, but whilst he shews a disposition to renew it (o). The principle is that for the sake of the preservation of the peace, any individual who sees it broken may restrain the liberty of him whom he sees breaking it, so long as his conduct shews that the public peace is likely to be endangered by his acts. Whilst persons are assembled who have committed acts of violence, and the danger of their renewal continues, the affray itself may be said to continue: and during the affray a constable may, not merely on his own view, but on the information and complaint of another, arrest the offenders, and of course the person so complaining is justified in giving the charge to the constable (p). If either party is dangerously wounded in an affray, and a bystander, endeavouring to arrest the other, is not able to arrest him without hurting or even wounding him, he is in no way liable to be punished, inasmuch as he is bound, under pain of fine and imprisonment, to arrest such an offender, and either to detain him till it appears whether the party will live or die, or to carry him before a justice of peace (q). A constable is not only empowered, but bound to do his best to stop an affray which occurs in his presence (r), and is also bound, in case of need, to call for the assistance of others, who, on refusal, are guilty of misdemeanor and liable to fine and imprisonment. To support an indictment against a person for refusing to aid and assist a constable in the execution of his duty in quelling a riot, it is necessary to prove: (1) that the constable actually saw a breach of the peace committed by two or more persons; (2) that there was a reasonable necessity for the constable calling upon other persons for their assistance and support; and (3) that the defendant was duly called upon to render his assistance, and that, without any physical impossibility or lawful excuse, he refused to give it. It is immaterial whether the aid of the defendant, if given, would have proved sufficient or useful (s). In the case of a violent quarrel in a house, the constable may break open the party, in thus doing what the law both allows and commends, he may well justify it; inasmuch as he is in no way in fault, and the damage done to the other was occasioned by a laudable intention to do him a kindness.

doors to preserve the peace ; and if affrayers fly to a house, and he follow with fresh suit, he may break open the doors to take them (t). And so far is the constable entrusted with a power over all actual affrays, that though he himself is a sufferer by them, and therefore liable to be objected against, as likely to be partial in his own cause, yet he may suppress ; and therefore if an assault be made upon him, he may not only defend himself but also imprison the offender in the same manner as if he were in no way a party (u). If a constable sees persons either actually engaged in an affray, as by striking, or offering to strike, by drawing their weapons, &c., or upon the very point of entering upon an affray, as where one threatens to kill, wound, or beat another, he may carry the offender before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law for his offence. It is said that he ought not to arrest persons who are quarrelling by words only, without any threats of personal hurt : and that he may only in such a case command them to avoid fighting (v). At common law (w), where the affray is over before the constable arrives, he cannot without a justice's warrant arrest the affrayers (x), unless a felony has been committed. But it would seem that where the affray has been stopped by private enterprise before his arrival he may take over affrayers arrested by private persons and carry them before a justice (y).

M. & R. 757, the Court said : 'the power of a constable to take into his custody, upon a reasonable information of a private person under such circumstances, and of that person to give in charge, must be correlative. Now, as to the authority of a constable, it is perfectly clear that he is not entitled to arrest in order himself to take sureties of the peace, for he cannot administer an oath. Sharrock v. Hanneimer, Cro. Eliz. 375, S.C. nom. Scarrett v. Tanner, Owen, 105. But whether he has that power in order to take before a magistrate, that he may take sureties of the peace, is a question on which the authorities differ. Hale seems to have been of opinion that a constable has this power (2 H. P. C. 89), and the same rule was laid down at Nisi Prius by Lord Mansfield, in a case referred to in 2 East, 306, and by Buller, J., in two others, one quoted in the same place, and another cited in 3 Camp. 421. On the other hand, there is a dictum to the contrary in Brooke's Abridgment, tit. 'Faux Imprisonment,' which is referred to and adopted by Coke in 2 Inst. 52 ; and in R. v. Tooley, 2 Ld. Raym. 1301, Holt, C.J., expressed the same opinion. Eyre, C.J., in Coupey v. Henley, 1 Esp. 540, does the same, and many of the text-books state that to be the law. Burn's Just. 258, tit. See ante, p. 433 ; and see Griffin v. Coleman, 4 H. & N. 265, as to a constable taking before a magistrate, without due inquiry, a man arrested and locked up by another constable on a false charge of assault.

of an affray, which private men or constables are either enabled or required by law to do. It would seem that he cannot, without a warrant, authorise the arrest of any person for an affray out of his view, but may issue his warrant to bring the offender before him, in order to compel him to find sureties for the peace (z).

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF CHALLENGING TO FIGHT.

THE law does not recognise the right of two persons to agree to fight or strike each other in a hostile manner with intent to wound or subdue each other, consequently duels and prize fights are wholly illegal (a).

It is an indictable misdemeanor to challenge another, either by speech or letter, to fight a duel, or to be the messenger of such a challenge, or even barely to endeavour to provoke another to send a challenge, or to fight; as by dispersing letters for that purpose, full of reflections, and insinuating a desire to fight (b). A duel in a public place is an affray (c); and even in a private place it would seem if with seconds to be an unlawful assembly (d). It is no defence, though it may be a ground for lighter punishment, to prove that the party challenging received provocation; for as, if one person should kill another, in a deliberate duel, under the provocation of charges against his character and conduct ever so grievous, it will be murder in him and his second, and, even mere incitement to fight, though under provocation, is in itself a misdemeanor, though no actual breach of the peace ensue from the challenge (e). Where, after a prisoner had been convicted, his brother went to the house of the foreman of the jury, and challenged him to mortal combat, it was held that this was a high contempt of the Court before which the trial was held, and punishable as such (f).

The offence of endeavouring to provoke another to send a challenge to fight is an indictable misdemeanor (g). In the case in which this was decided the provocation was given in a letter containing libellous matter, and the prefatory part of the indictment alleged that the defendant intended to do the party bodily harm, and to break the King's peace. The sending such letter was held to be an act done towards the procuring the commission of the misdemeanor meant to be accomplished (h). In such a case where an evil intent accompanying an act is necessary to constitute such act a crime, the intent must be alleged in the prefatory or in some other part of the indictment; but where the act is in itself unlawful, the law infers an evil intent, and the allegation of such intent is merely matter of form, and need not be proved by extrinsic evidence on the part of the prosecution (i).

(h) The letter was: 'Sir,—It will, I conclude, from the description you give of your feelings and ideas with respect to insult, in a letter to Mr. Jones, of last Monday's date, be sufficient for me to tell you, that in the whole of the Carmarthenshire election business, as far as it relates to me, you have behaved like a blackguard. I shall expect to hear from you on this subject, and will punctually attend to any appointment you may think proper to make.' See ante, pp. 140, 203.

In substance the offences above stated are mere examples of the general rule of law that it is a misdemeanor to incite another to commit a criminal offence (j).

Mere words of provocation, as 'liar' and 'knave,' though motives and mediate provocation for a breach of the peace, yet do not tend immediately to the breach of the peace, like a challenge to fight, or a threat to commit a battery (k). But words directly tending to a breach of the peace may be indictable; as if one man challenge another by words; (l) and if it can be proved that the words used were intended to provoke the party to whom they were addressed to give a challenge, the case would seem to fall within the same rule (m).

Where a person wrote a letter with intent to provoke a challenge, sealed it up, and posted it in Westminster, addressed to the prosecutor in the city of London, by whom it was there received; Ellenborough, C.J., held that the defendant might be indicted in Middlesex, as there was a sufficient publication in that county by putting the letter into the post-office there with the intent that it should be delivered to the prosecutor elsewhere; and that if the letter had never been delivered, the defendant's offence would have been the same (n).

Criminal informations for sending challenges have often been granted in the High Court (o); but where it appeared, upon the affidavits, that the party applying for an information had himself given the first challenge, the Court refused to proceed against the other party by way of information and left the prosecutor to his ordinary remedy by action or indictment (p). A rule to show cause why such an information should not be granted has been made, upon producing copies only of the letters in which the challenge was contained, such copies being sufficiently verified (q).

The punishment for this misdemeanor is fine and (or) imprisonment without hard labour, at the discretion of the Court, which will be guided by such circumstances of aggravation or mitigation as are to be found in each particular case (r).

A sparring match with gloves, under Queensberry or similar rules given merely as an exhibition of skill and without any intention to fight until one is incapacitated by injury or exhaustion is not a “prize fight” under Code secs. 105 and 2(31); to constitute a “prize fight” there must have been a previous arrangement for a “fight” in the ordinary sense of the term, and that involves an intention to continue the encounter until one or the other of the combatants gives in from exhaustion or from injury received. R. v. Littlejohn, 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 212.

The defendants advertised a boxing exhibition which was effectively held in a public hall, and was accompanied by all the particulars and circumstances of a prize fight. Complainant submitted that the accused came within the provision of the statute; and on behalf of the defendants it was contended that the encounter was merely a scientific boxing match, and, moreover, only a sham fight, not forbidden by law. Held, that as the proof adduced established that the encounter in question was accompanied by all the circumstances and elements which constitute a prize fight, the defendants committed an infraction of the law, for which they must be found guilty. Steele v. Maber, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 445.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER.

SECT. I.—COMMON LAW.

A FORCIBLE entry or detainer is committed by violently taking or keeping possession of lands and tenements with menaces, force, and arms, and without the authority of the law (a). At common law, and before the passing of the statutes relating to this subject, if a man had a right of entry upon lands or tenements, he was permitted to enter with force and arms; and to retain possession by force, where his entry was lawful (b). And a person wrongfully dispossessed of his goods may justify the retaking of them by force from the wrong-doer, if he refuses to redeliver them (c). In many cases, however, an indictment will lie at common law for a forcible entry if it contains not merely the common technical words, 'with force and arms,' but also if the facts charged shew actual force, violence, unlawful assembly, riot, or other circumstances amounting to something more than a bare trespass (d). In R. v. Wilson (e), Kenyon, C. J., laid it down that no one may with force and violence assert his own title. But on a subsequent day of the same term he said that the Court wished that the grounds of their opinion in that case might be understood, and that it might not be considered as a precedent in other cases to which it did not apply. He then proceeded: 'Perhaps some doubt may hereafter arise respecting what Mr. Serjeant Hawkins says (f), that at common law the party may enter with force into that to which he has a legal title. But without giving any opinion concerning that dictum one way or the other, but leaving it to be proved or disproved whenever that question

R. 431, the entry made was by the landlord's putting his cattle on the ground after the expiration of the tenant's term, and was entirely peaceable; but Kenyon, C.J., said: 'If the landlord had entered with a strong hand to dispossess the tenant by force, he might have been indicted for a forcible entry.' In Turner v. Meymott, 1 Bing. 158; 7 Moore (C. P.), 574, where the landlord had broken into an empty house after the expiration of the tenant's term, but before the tenant had delivered up possession, it was held that as against the tenant he had a right to enter; but Dallas, C.J., said: 'If he has used force, that is an offence of itself, but an offence against the public for which, if he had done wrong, he may be indicted.'

shall arise, all that we wish to say is, that our opinion in this case leaves that question untouched: it appearing by this indictment that the defendants unlawfully entered, and therefore the Court cannot intend that they had any title' (g). There is now no doubt that a party may be guilty of a forcible entry by violently, and with force, entering into that to which he has a legal title (h). But where a breach of the peace is committed by a freeholder, who, in order to get into possession of his land, assaults a person wrongfully holding possession of it against his will, although the freeholder may be liable to indictment for a forcible entry, he is not civilly liable to the person wrongfully holding possession (i).

SECT. II.—UNDER THE STATUTES OF FORCIBLE ENTRY.

Whatever may be the true doctrine upon this subject at common law, the statutes which have been passed respecting forcible entries and detainers are clearly intended to restrain all persons from having recourse to violent methods of doing themselves justice; and it is the more usual and effectual method to proceed upon these statutes, which give restitution and damages to the party aggrieved.

By a statute of 1381 (5 Rich. II. stat. 1, c. 7) (g), 'The King defendeth that none from henceforth make any entry into any lands and tenements, but in case where entry is given by the law, and in such case not with strong hand, nor with multitude of people, but only in peaceable and easy manner. And if any man from henceforth do to the contrary, and thereof be duly convict, he shall be punished by imprisonment of his body, and thereof ransomed (k) at the King's will.' This statute gave no speedy remedy, leaving the party injured to proceed by indictment (l); and made no provision at all against forcible detainers. By a statute of 1391 (15 Rich. II. c. 2), it is enacted, that if complaint of forcible entry into lands and tenements, or other possessions whatsoever, 'cometh to the justices of peace or to any of them, the same justices or justice take sufficient power of the county, and go to the place where such force is made; and if they find any that hold such place forcibly after such entry made, they shall be taken and put in the next gaol, there to abide convict by the record of the same justices or justice, until they have made fine

(g) 8 T. R. 364.

(h) In Newton v. Harland, 1 M. & Gr. 644, Court of Common Pleas seems to have been of opinion that a landlord who entered forcibly into the house of a tenant after the expiration of his term, would be guilty of a forcible entry, both at common law and under the statutes; and the only doubt was whether, supposing there was such a forcible entry upon a tenant after the expiration of the term, the possession thereby obtained was legal. There has been considerable discussion as to whether Newton v. Harland is good law on the question whether an action lay for the forcible entry. This is denied in Harvey v. Bridges, 14 M. & W. 437; Blades v. Higgs, 10 C. B. (N. S.) 713; Beddall v. Maitland, 17 Ch. D. 174; and in Smith, L.C. (11th ed.) 138, 139. See and ransom to the King (m): and that all the people of the county, as well the sheriffs as other, shall be attendant upon the same justices to go and assist the same justices to arrest such offenders upon pain of imprisonment, and to make fine to the King. And in the same manner it shall be done of them that make such forcible entries in benefices or offices of holy church.' This statute gave no remedy against those who were guilty of a forcible detainer after a peaceful entry (n), nor against those who were guilty of both a forcible entry and forcible detainer, if they were removed before the coming of a justice of peace (o), and it gave no power to the justices to restore the party injured to his possession, and did not impose any penalty on the sheriff for disobeying the precepts of the justices in the execution of the statute (p).

(l) There is no civil remedy given by the statute for the forcible entry (Beddall v. Maitland, 17 Ch. D. 174, Fry, J.), although such a remedy is available for independent wrongful acts, e.g., assault (Newton v. Harland, 1 M. & G. 644), or damage to furniture (Beddall v. Maitland, ubi sup.). But see Jones v. Foley [1891], 1 Q.B. 730.

It was, therefore, found necessary to provide by a statute of 1429 (8 Hen. VI. c. 9), after reciting the above defects of the Act of 1391, that it should be confirmed and extended to forcible detainers, and it was enacted as follows:—

'Though that such persons making such entry be present or else departed before the coming of the justices or justice, notwithstanding the same justices or justice, in some good town next to the tenements so entered, or in some other convenient place, according to their discretion, shall have or either of them shall have authority and power to inquire, by the people of the same county, as well of them that make such forcible entries into lands and tenements as of them which the same hold with force; and if it be found before any of them that any doth contrary to this statute, then the said justices or justice shall cause to re-seise the lands and tenements so entered or holden as afore, and shall put the party so put out in full possession of the same lands and tenements so entered or holden as before.' After making provision concerning the precepts of the justices to the sheriff to return a jury to inquire of forcible entries, the qualification of the jurors (q), and the remedy by action against those who obtain forcible possession of lands, &c., the statute enacts, that 'mayors, justices or justice of peace, sheriffs and bailiffs of cities, towns, and boroughs (r), having franchise, have in such cities, &c., like power to remove such entries and in other articles aforesaid, rising within the same, as the justices of peace and sheriffs in counties.' The statute concludes with a proviso that 'they which keep their possessions with force in any lands and tenements, whereof they or their ancestors, or they whose estate they have in such lands and tenements, have continued their possessions in the same by three years or more, be not endamaged by force of this statute.' This proviso is further confirmed by an Act of 1588 (31 Eliz. c. 11), which enacts that 'no restitution, upon any indictment of forcible entry, or holding with force, be made to any person or persons, if the person or persons so indicted hath had the occupation, or hath been in quiet possession, by the space of three whole years together, next before the day of such indictment so found, and his, her, or their estate or estates therein not ended or determined; which the party indicted shall and may allege for stay of restitution, and restitution to stay until that be tried, if the other will deny or traverse the same; and if the same allegation be tried against the same person or persons so indicted, then the same person or persons so indicted to pay such costs and damages to the other party as shall be assessed by the judges or justices before whom the same shall be tried; the same costs and damages to be recovered and levied as is usual for costs and damages contained in judgments upon other actions.'

Summary Jurisdiction.—The Act of 1391 (15 Rich. II., c. 2), gives magistrates jurisdiction to convict summarily on their own view in cases of forcible detainer only where there had been a previous forcible entry, so that, notwithstanding that statute, a party who had acquired the possession of lands peaceably but unlawfully, could detain them forcibly without incurring any criminal liability (s). 8 Hen. VI. c. 9 gives justices summary jurisdiction only in cases of forcible detainer, preceded by an unlawful entry, and therefore a conviction by justices on that statute merely stating an entry and a forcible detainer is insufficient (t).

Summary convictions under the statutes were at all times rare, and the parties usually sought restitution by indictment (u). On these statutes it has been held, that if a lessee for years or a copyholder is ousted, and the lessor or lord disseised, and such ouster, as well as disseisin, is found in an indictment of forcible entry, the Court may, in their discretion, award restitution of the possession to the lessee or copyholder; which was, by necessary consequence, a re-seisin of the freehold also, whether the lessor or lord had desired or opposed it. But it was disputed whether a lessee for years or a copyholder, ousted by the lessor or lord, could have a restitution of their possession within the equity of 8 Hen. VI., c. 9, the words of which are, that the justice 'shall cause to re-seise the lands,' &c., by which it seems to be implied that the party must be ousted of an estate whereof he may be said to be seised, which must at least be a freehold. To remove this doubt, 21 Jac. I. c. 15 enacted that such judges, justices, or justice of the peace as by reason of any Act of Parliament then in force were authorised and enabled upon inquiry to give restitution of possession to tenants of any estate of freehold of their lands, &c., entered upon by force or withholden by force, shall have the like authority (upon indictment of such forcible entry or forcible withholding before then duly found) to give like restitution of possession to 'tenants for term of years, tenants by copy of Court roll, guardians by knight's service, tenants by elegit, statute merchant and staple.' A tenant by the verge has been held not to be within this statute: but this decision has been questioned; as such person, having no other evidence of his title than the copy of Court roll, seems at least to be within the meaning, if not within the words, of the statute (v).

If a lessor ejects his lessee for years, and is afterwards forcibly put out of possession again by such lessee, he cannot obtain a restitution under the statutes : but a justice of peace, it would seem, may remove the force, and commit the offender (w).

The law upon these statutes may be further considered with reference—

I. To the persons who may commit the offence, infra.

II. To the nature of the possessions in respect of which it may be committed, p. 446.

III. To the acts which will amount to a forcible entry, p. 446.

IV. To the acts which amount to a forcible detainer, p. 448.

The principle of the statutes is to require resort to the Courts by persons seeking to enforce a right of entry on land, unless they are in a position to enter in a peaceable and easy manner (x).

Where the person who has the legal title to land is in actual possession, any attempt to eject him by force falls within the statutes of forcible entry. This rule applies even if the possession has only just begun, or has been acquired by forcing open a lock, and even where the ejector sets up a claim to possession (y).

And a licence by tenant to landlord to eject him without legal process has been held void, as in effect or licence to break the statutes (5 Rich. II. st. 1, c. 7) (z).

I. A man who forcibly enters into a tenement of which he is the sole and lawful possessor, e.g., who breaks open the doors of his own dwelling-house, or of a castle, which is his own inheritance, but forcibly detained from him by one who claims the bare custody of it, is not guilty of a forcible entry or detainer within the statutes (a). A wife was indicted with others for a forcible entry into a house, which she had taken for herself, but of which her husband had afterwards, with the landlord's consent, obtained possession, and it was objected that a wife could not be guilty of a forcible entry into the house of her husband. Tenterden, C.J., said : ' although a wife certainly cannot commit a trespass on the property of her husband, I am by no means satisfied that, if she comes with strong hand, she may not be indictable for a forcible entry, which proceeds on the breach of the public peace . . . ' ' As at present advised I think she may be guilty of a forcible entry, if her entry was made under circumstances of violence amounting to a breach of the public peace ' (b). A joint tenant or tenant in common may offend against the statutes either by forcibly ejecting or forcibly keeping out his co-tenant ; for though the entry of such a tenant is lawful per my et per tout, so that he is not liable to an action of trespass at common law, yet the lawfulness of his entry does not excuse the violence, or lessen the injury, done to his co-tenant ; and, consequently, an indictment of forcible entry into a moiety of a manor, &c., is good (c). Where a man has been long in possession of land under a defeasible title, and a claim is made by him who has the possession of his own tenant at will. It would seem that forcible entry, even against a tenant at will, is indictable within the statutes. See R. v. Wilson, 8 T. R. 357, 364. Taunton v. Costar, 7 T. R. 431. Turner v. Meymott, 1 Bing. 158. Lows v. Telford [1876], 1 App. Cas. 414. Beddall v. Maitland, 17 Ch.D. 174.

a right of entry, if the wrongful possessor continues his occupation, he will be punishable for a forcible entry and detainer; because all his estate was defeated by the claim, and his continuance in possession afterwards amounts in the judgment of law to a new entry (d). It does not follow from the decision in R. v. Oakley (e) that 8 Hen. VI. c. 9, does not apply to the case of a tenant at will or for years, holding over after the will is determined or term expired, because the continuance in possession afterwards may amount in judgment of law to a new entry (f).

II. A person may be guilty of forcible entry into ecclesiastical possessions, as churches, vicarage houses, &c. (g). And as a general rule, a person may be indicted for forcible entry into any incorporeal hereditament for which a writ of entry would lie, either by the common law, as for rent, or by statute, as for tithes, &c. It is, however, questioned whether there is any good authority that such an indictment will lie for a common or office; though it seems agreed that an indictment of forcible detainer lies against any one, whether he be the tenant or a stranger, who forcibly disturbs the lawful proprietor in the enjoyment of such possessions; as by violently resisting a lord in his distress for a rent, or by menacing a commoner with bodily hurt, if he dares to put in his beasts into the common, &c. No one comes within the statutes by violence offered to another in respect of a way, or other easement which is no possession. And it seems that a man cannot be convicted, upon view, under 15 Rich. II. c. 2, of a forcible detainer of any incorporeal hereditaments wherein he cannot be said to have made a precedent forcible entry (h).

L. was mortgagee in fee of a dwelling-house, the possession being left in the mortgagor. The mortgagor while in possession let the house to T. for a goods store. It was otherwise unoccupied. Early one morning, during the continuance of T.'s tenancy, L., without giving any notice to the mortgagor or to T., went to the house, in company with a carpenter and another man. The carpenter opened the front door, and the other man entered the house. L. and the carpenter remained on the doorstep, the latter being employed in putting on a new lock. While this was happening, T., and his brother-in-law, W., with several other persons came up, and T. and W. climbed into the house through a window, and after a slight struggle expelled L. and his men from the premises. L. indicted T. and W. and others for a forcible entry, riot, affray, and assault. T. and W. were tried and acquitted. They defended themselves by the same solicitor, and incurred joint costs. T. and W. then brought an action against L. for malicious prosecution, and obtained a verdict. It was held in the House of Lords that there was reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, inasmuch as the facts shewed that T. and W. were, at the time of the expulsion of L., disturbing a possession which had been lawfully acquired by him (i).

III. A forcible entry must be with a strong hand, coming with a multitude of people or any excessive number of persons, or with unusual weapons, or with menace of life or limb; it must be accompanied with some circumstances of actual violence or terror; and an entry which has no other force than such as is implied by the law in every trespass is not within the statutes (j). An entry may be forcible not only in respect of a violence actually done to the person of a man, as by beating him if he refuses to relinquish his possession; but also in respect of any other violence in the manner of the entry, as by breaking open the doors of a house, whether any person be in at the time or not, especially if it be a dwelling-house (k), and perhaps also by any act of outrage after the entry, as by carrying away the party's goods, &c., which if found in an assize of novel disseisin, made the defendant a disseisor with force, and liable to fine and (or) imprisonment (l). It is a forcible entry for a man to enter by force to distrain for arrears of rent, because, though he does not claim the land itself, yet he claims a right and title out of it, which by the statutes he is forbidden to exert by force. But if a man who has a rent is resisted from his distress with force, this is a forcible disseisin of the rent, for which he may recover treble damages in an assize, or may fine and imprison the party; but he cannot have a writ of restitution; for the statutes do not give the justices power to reseat the rent, but only the lands and tenements themselves (m). If one finds a man out of his house, and forcibly keeps him out of it, and sends persons to take peaceable possession of it in the party's absence, this seems to be a forcible entry (n). And there may be a forcible entry where any person's wife, children, or servants, are upon the lands to preserve the possession; because whatever a man does by his agents is his own act; his possession is not preserved by having his cattle on the ground, because they are not capable of being substituted as agents (o).

Whenever a man, either by speech or conduct, at the time of entry, gives those in possession of the tenements, which he claims, just cause to fear that he will do them some bodily hurt, if they will not give way to him, his entry is deemed forcible; whether he causes such a terror by carrying with him an unusual number of servants, or by arming himself in such a manner as plainly indicates a design to back his pretensions by force, or by actually threatening to kill, maim, or beat those who shall continue in possession, or by giving out such speeches as plainly imply a purpose of using force against those who shall make any resistance (p). It is not necessary that any one should be assaulted; for it is sufficient if the entry is with such number of persons and show of force as is calculated to deter the rightful owner from sending them away, and resuming his own possession (q). But forcible entry is not proved by evidence of a mere trespass, there must be proof of such force, or at least such a show of force, as is calculated to prevent any resistance (r). 'If one enters peaceably, and when he is come in useth violence, this is a forcible entry' (s). Thus, if a man enters peaceably, yet if he turns the party out of possession by force, or frightens him out of possession by threats, it is a forcible entry (t). But threatening to spoil the party's goods, or destroy his cattle, or to do him any like damage, which is not personal, if he will not quit the possession, seems not to amount to a forcible entry (u).

If a person who pretends a title to lands, merely goes over them, either with or without a great number of attendants, armed or unarmed, in his way to the church, or market, or for a like purpose, without doing any act which either expressly or impliedly amounts to a claim of the lands, he does not 'enter' within the meaning of the statutes; otherwise if he make an actual claim with any circumstances of force or terror (v). Drawing a latch and entering a house seems not to be a forcible entry (w), e.g., if a man opens the door with a key, or enters by an open window, or if the entry is without the semblance of force, as by coming in peaceably, enticing the owner out of possession, and afterwards excluding him by shutting the door, without other force (x).

A single person may commit a forcible entry as well as a number (y). But all who accompany a man when he makes a forcible entry are deemed to enter with him, whether they actually come upon the lands or not (z). So, if several come in company where their entry is not lawful, and all, except one, enter in a peaceable manner, and that one only uses force, it is a forcible entry in them all, because they came in company to do an unlawful act; but it is otherwise where one had a right of entry, for there they only come to do a lawful act, and therefore it is the force of him only who used it (a). And a person who barely agrees to a forcible entry made for his benefit, but without his knowledge or privity, is not within the statutes, because he did not concur in or promote the force (b).

IV. Forcible detainer is where a man, who enters peaceably, afterwards detains his possession by force; and the same circumstances of violence or terror which will make an entry forcible, will also make a detainer forcible. It seems to follow that whoever keeps in his house an unusual number of people, or unusual weapons, or threatens to do some bodily hurt to the former possessor, if he dare return, is guilty of a forcible detainer, though no attempt is made to re-enter; and it has been said that he also will come under the like construction who places men at a distance from the house in order to assault anyone who shall attempt to make an entry into it; and that he is in like manner guilty who shuts his doors against a justice of peace coming to view the force, and obstinately refuses to let him come in (c). This doctrine will apply to a lessee who, after the end of his term, keeps arms in his house to oppose the entry of the lessor, though no one attempt an entry; or to a tenant at will detaining with force after the will is determined (d): and it will apply in like manner to a detaining with force by a mortgagor after the mortgage is foreclosed. And a lessee who resists with force a distress for rent, or forestalling or rescuing the distress, is also guilty of this offence (e).

But a man is not guilty of the offence of forcible detainer if he merely refuses to go out of a house, and continues therein in despite of another (f). So that it is not a forcible detainer if a lessee at will, after the determination of the will, denies possession to the lessor when he demands it; or shuts the door against the lessor when he would enter; or if he keeps out, by force, a commoner upon his own land (g). And 8 Hen. VI. c. 9, and 31 Eliz. c. 11 (h), do not apply to a person who has been in possession for three years by himself, or any other under whom he claims. But a person in quiet possession for three years, and then disseised by force, and restored, cannot afterwards detain with force within three years after his restitution; for his possession was interrupted (i).

The criminal remedies against persons guilty of forcible entries or detainers are either by complaint to justices of the peace (who may proceed upon view), or by indictment at quarter sessions (j). And if a forcible entry or detainer is made by three persons or more, it is also a riot; and may be proceeded against as such, if no inquiry has before been made of the force (k). Some of the points which have been determined with respect to an indictment for these offences, and also concerning the award of restitution, may be shortly noticed (l).

Indictment.—The statutes seem to require that the entry should be laid in the indictment to be with a strong hand (manu forti), or cum multitudine gentium (m): but some have held that equivalent words would be sufficient, especially if the indictment concluded contra formam statuti; but it was held not sufficient to say only that the party entered vi et armis since that was the common allegation in every trespass (n). No particular technical words are necessary in an indictment at common law; all that is required is, that it should appear by the indictment that such force and violence have been used as constitute a public breach of the peace (o).

The tenement in which the force was committed must be described with such certainty as to inform the defendant of the particular charge against him, and to enable the justices or sheriff to know how to restore the injured party to his possession. Thus an indictment has been held insufficient where it charged forcible entry into a 'tenement' (p), which may signify anything whatsoever wherein a man may have an estate of freehold (q), or into a 'house or tenement' (r), or into 'two closes of meadow or pasture' (s), or into 'a rood or half a rood of land' (t), or 'into certain lands belonging to such a house' (u), or into such a house without shewing in what town it lies (v), or into a tenement, with the appurtenances, called Truepenny in D. (w). But an indictment for a forcible entry in unum messuagium sive domum mansionalem, &c., is good, for these are words equipollent (x). And an indictment for an entry into a close called H.'s close, without adding the number of acres, is good; for here is as much certainty as is required in ejectment (y). And an indictment may be void as to such part of it only as is uncertain, and good for so much as is certain: thus an indictment for a forcible entry into a house and certain acres of land may be quashed as to the land, and stand good as to the house (z). Upon an indictment against a wife for a forcible entry into a house, which she had originally taken in her own name, but into which her husband had afterwards entered for the purpose of giving up possession to the owner, the house is well described as the house of the husband (a).

An indictment on 8 Hen. VI. c. 9 (b), must state that the place was the freehold of the party aggrieved at the time of the force (c); and if founded on 21 Jac. I. c. 15 (ante, p. 444), it should state that he was at such time a tenant for a term of years or otherwise entitled as mentioned in that statute (d). An inquisition under 8 Hen. VI. c. 9, will not warrant a justice in restoring possession, unless it sets forth the estate possessed by the party in the property (e). But an indictment which charges that the defendants forcibly entered into a messuage of one W. P., he the said W. P. then and there being seised thereof, sufficiently avers the present seisin of W. P. to warrant the Court in awarding restitution (f). But in an indictment at common law, where the breach of the public peace is the gist of the offence, and the prosecutor is not entitled to restitution and damages, it appears to be sufficient to state only that the prosecutor was in possession of the premises (g).

A repugnancy in setting forth the offence in an indictment on the statutes is incurable : as where it is alleged that the party was possessed 'of a term of years, or of a copyhold estate,' and that the defendants disseised him ; or that the defendants disseised J. S. of land then and yet being his freehold, for such statement implies that he always continued in possession ; and if so, it is impossible he could be disseised at all (h). An indictment on 8 Hen. VI. c. 9, setting forth an entry and forcible detainer, seems to be good, without shewing whether the entry was forcible or peaceable : but it must set forth an entry ; for otherwise it does not appear but that the party has been always in possession, in which case he may lawfully detain it by force (i). It appears to be sufficient to state, that the defendant on such a day entered, &c., and disseised, &c., without adding the words then and there ; for it is the natural intendment that the entry and disseisin both happened together (j). A disseisin is sufficiently set forth by alleging that the defendant entered, &c., into such a tenement, and disseised the party, without using the words 'unlawfully,' or 'expelled,' for they are implied (k). But no indictment can warrant restitution, unless it finds that the wrong-doer ousted the party aggrieved, and also continues his possession at the time of the finding of the indictment ; for it is a repugnancy to award restitution of possession to one who never was in possession, and it is in vain to award it to one who does not appear to have lost it (l).

It is said that if a bill, both for forcible entry and forcible detainer, is preferred to a grand jury, and found 'not a true bill' as to the entry with force, and 'a true bill' as to the detainer, it will not warrant an award of restitution ; but is void, because the grand jury cannot find a bill, true for part, and false for part, as a petit jury may (m).

Upon an indictment on 21 Jac. I. c. 15, or 8 Hen. VI. c. 9, whereby restitution of the possession of lands entered upon by force, or holden by force, may be awarded to the respective tenants thereof ; the tenant whose land has been entered upon, or withheld by force, is a competent witness for the prosecution (n).

On an indictment at common law, the prosecutor need only prove peaceable possession at the time of the ouster (o). On an indictment upon 8 Hen. VI. c. 9, seisin in fee must be shewn ; and on an indictment founded on 21 Jac. I. c. 15, a tenancy for years or other term within that statute must be shewn (p) ; but it seems that proof that the prosecutor held colourably as a freeholder or leaseholder will suffice ; and that the Court will not, on the trial, enter into the validity of an adverse claim made by the defendant, which he ought to assert, not by force, but by action (q).

Restitution may be awarded by the justice or justices before whom an indictment of forcible entry or detainer is found : but by no other justices, unless the indictment be removed by certiorari into the High Court (King's Bench Division) ; and that Court, by the plenitude of its power, can restore, because that is supposed to be implied by the statute ; on the ground that whenever an inferior jurisdiction is erected, the superior jurisdiction must have authority to put it in execution. So, if an indictment be found before the justices of the peace at their quarter sessions, they have authority to award a writ of restitution, because the statute having given power to the justices or justice to reseise, it may as well be done by them in court as out of it (r). It is laid down in some books that the justices of Oyer and Terminer or General Gaol Delivery, though they may inquire of forcible entries, and fine the parties, cannot award a writ of restitution (s).

Restitution ought only to be awarded for the possession of tenements visible and corporeal ; for a man who has a right to such as are invisible and incorporeal, as rents or commons, cannot be put out of possession of them, but only at his own election, by a fiction of law, to enable him to recover damages against the person that disturbs him in the enjoyment of them ; and all the remedy that can be desired against a force in respect to such possessions is to have the force removed, and those who are guilty of it punished, which may be done by 15 Rich. II. c. 2 (t). And restitution is to be awarded only to the person found by the indictment to have been put out of actual possession, and not to one who was only seised in law (u). Upon the removal of the proceedings into the High Court by certiorari, that Court may award a restitution discretionally (v). And the same principle applies to a judge of assize upon the finding of an indictment for forcible entry ; namely, that the proceedings being ex parte, a discretion may be exercised. Where, therefore, an indictment for a forcible entry and detainer is found at the assizes, it is in the discretion of the judge whether he will grant restitution or as are specially limited to justices of peace. But in Com. Dig. tit. 'Forc. Entr.' (D. 5), it is said that justices of gaol delivery may award restitution upon an indictment before them : and Sav. 78 is cited : and afterwards id. (D. 7), it is said that restitution shall not be by justices of assize, gaol delivery, or justices of peace, if the indictment was not found before them ; and 1 Hale, 140, Dalt. c. 44, 131, are cited ; assuming here, as it should seem, that if the indictment were found before justices of assize and gaol delivery, they might award restitution : and see R. v. Harland, 8 A. & E. 826, and R. v. Hake, note (a), to R. v. Williams, 4 Man. & Ry. 483, where a judge at the assizes granted a writ of restitution.

not ; and if he refuse to grant it, the High Court will not inquire whether he has exercised his discretion rightly, or grant a mandamus to the judge to grant restitution (w). But in the case of local justices, who are to go to the spot, and make inquiry by the inquisition of the jury, and examination of witnesses ; if the jury find the facts, it is imperative on the justices to grant restitution ; and the reason is that there has been a fair inquiry (x).

It appears by the proviso in 8 Hen. VI. c. 9, and also by 31 Eliz. c. 11, that any one indicted upon those statutes may allege quiet possession for three whole years to stay the award of restitution : and it has been held that such possession must have continued without interruption during three whole years next before the indictment (y). And it must be of a lawful estate, so that a disseisor can in no case justify a forcible entry or detainer against the disseisee having a right of entry, as it seems that he may against a stranger, or even against the disseisee having, by his laches, lost his right of entry (z). Wherever such possession is pleaded in bar of a restitution, either in the High Court or before justices of the peace, no restitution ought to be awarded till the truth of the plea has been tried. The plea need not shew under what title, or of what estate, such possession was ; because not the title, but the possession only, is material (a). If the defendant tenders a traverse of the force (which must be in writing), no restitution ought to be till the traverse is tried ; and the justice, before whom the indictment is found, ought to award a venire for a jury : but if such jury find so much of the indictment to be true as will warrant restitution, it will be sufficient, though they find the other part of it to be false (b). Where the defendant pleads three years' possession in stay of restitution, under 31 Eliz. c. 11, and it is found against him, he must pay costs (c).

The justices who have awarded a restitution on an indictment of forcible entry, &c., or any two or one of them, may afterwards supersede such restitution upon an insufficiency in the indictment appearing unto them : but no other justices or Court whatsoever have such power, except the High Court ; a certiorari from whence wholly closes the hands of the justices of peace, and avoids any restitution which is executed after its teste, but does not bring the justices into contempt without notice (d).

On an equitable construction of the statutes, but on their express words, it is considered that the High Court has discretionary power, if a restitution shall appear to have been illegally awarded or executed, to set it aside, and grant a re-restitution to the defendant. But a defendant cannot in any case whatsoever, ex rigore juris, demand restitution, either upon the quashing of the indictment, or on a verdict found for him on a traverse thereof, &c. ; for the power is never made use of by the High Court except when, upon consideration of the whole circumstances of the case, the defendant appears to have some right to the tenements, the possession whereof he lost by the restitution granted to the prosecutor (e).

Where a conviction for a forcible entry or detainer is quashed by the High Court after restitution ordered, the Court is bound to award re-restitution, although the conviction be quashed for a merely technical error, and the lease of the dispossessed person has expired during the litigation (f).

Where on a traverse of an indictment under the statutes, a man has been found to have been unjustly put out of possession, the Court of King's Bench has awarded re-restitution, notwithstanding proof that, since the restitution granted upon the indictment, a stranger has recovered the possession of the same land in a Manorial Court (g).

The justices or justice may execute the writ of restitution in person, or may make their precept to the sheriff to do it (h). The sheriff, if need be, may raise the power of the county to assist him in the execution of the precept ; and therefore, if he makes a return thereto that he could not make a restitution by reason of resistance, he is liable to amercement (i). It is said, that a justice of peace or sheriff may break open a house to make restitution (j).

If possession under a writ of restitution is avoided immediately after execution by a fresh force, the party shall have a second writ of restitution without a new inquisition ; but the second writ must be applied for within a reasonable time (k). And an order of restitution made three years after the inquisition, was quashed (l).

Definition of Forcible Entry.—Code sec. 102.

Definition of Forcible Detainer.—Code sec. 102(2).

Punishment of.—Code sec. 103.

“Entering” means not merely going upon land or trespassing upon it; there must accompany the act of going upon the land some intent to take possession of the land itself and deprive the possessor of the land. Such an interference with the possession as trespassing upon it for the purpose of taking away chattels upon the land is not an “entering” within the Code. R. v. Pike (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 314, 12 Man. R. 314.

Forcible entry of a dwelling house may consist of an entry made with such threats and shew of force as would, if resisted, cause a breach of the peace, although no actual force was used. R. v. Walker (1906), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 197, 4 O.L.R. 288.

Where, from thirty to forty employees of the G. W. Railway Co. went upon land then in possession of the S. & H. Railway Co., and those resisting had good reason to apprehend violence in the event of further resistance, and yielded possession in the apprehension of such violence, it was held that the entry was a forcible one. R. v. Smith, 43 U.C.Q.B. 369.

The gist of the offence is the forcible depriving of the other's actual and peaceable possession in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace. R. v. Cokely, 13 U.C.Q.B. 521. Even if the defendant had a right of entry, the assertion of that right “with strong hand or with multitude of people” is equally an offence as if he had no right.

It is within the discretion of the Judge who tries the cause either to grant or refuse restitution. R. v. Wightman (1869), 29 U.C.Q.B. 211; R. v. Smith (1878), 43 U.C.Q.B. 369; R. v. Jackson, Draper's Rep. Upper Canada 53.

BOOK THE SEVENTH.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE DUE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF PERJURY AND COGNATE OFFENCES.

SECT. I.—PERJURY IN GENERAL.

PERJURY is a misdemeanor indictable at common law (a). It consists in giving upon oath, in (or for the purposes of) a judicial proceeding, before a competent tribunal, whether it be a Court of the common law or acting under a statute (aa), evidence which is material to some question depending on the proceeding and is false to the knowledge of the deponent, or is not believed by him to be true (b). The oath taken must be to swear the truth, and the offence does not include breaches of the oath of a juror, or of promissory oaths (c). ‘Oath’ in this chapter includes affirmation and declaration in cases where a witness is by law empowered or required to affirm or declare instead of taking the witness’s oath (d).

Perjury is not committed when the false evidence is given by a person who is not a competent witness. Thus, before the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 36), if a defendant in a criminal case was sworn, perjury could not be assigned on his evidence (e). Incompetence may arise from a disqualification imposed by common law, e.g., of calling a wife as a witness against her husband in a criminal case; or by statute; or may, as in the case of young children, arise from inability to understand the nature of the witness’s oath. The witness must be sworn or affirmed. The old averment was that he was ‘sworn in due course of law, and did then take his corporal oath upon the Holy Gospel of God’ (f). But a witness may be convicted of perjury on an oath administered to him in such form and with such ceremonies as he may declare to be binding (g), or upon solemn affirmation where he has no religious belief (h), or the taking of an oath is contrary to his religious belief (i).

It does not matter whether the false evidence is given orally or on affidavit, or in answer to interrogatories in an action, or concerning a contempt, nor whether the oath was in the deponent's own cause, or in that of another person, nor whether the evidence was given for the Crown or for the defence in a criminal case (j). Nor does it matter whether the false oath was believed or disbelieved, nor whether it caused any injury to the person against whom it was given; for the gist of the offence at common law (k) is the abuse of public justice, and not the injury to an individual (l).

By the Oaths Act, 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 105), 'in all cases in which an oath may lawfully be and shall have been administered to any person either as a jurymen or a witness, or a deponent in any proceeding, civil or criminal, in any Court of law or equity in the United Kingdom, or on appointment to any office or employment, or on any occasion whatever, such person is bound by the oath administered: provided the same shall have been administered in such form and with such ceremonies as such person may declare to be binding; and every such person, in case of wilful false swearing, may be convicted of the crime of perjury in the same manner as if the oath had been administered in the form and with the ceremonies most commonly adopted.'

This Act does not apply to affirmations or declarations in lieu of the witness's oath. But such affirmations are permitted in the case of Quakers and Moravians, and persons who have no religious belief, or a religious belief which precludes their taking the witness's oath. The statutes substituting affirmation for oath provide that a false affirmation shall be punishable as perjury (m).

Unsworn Evidence.—By the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 4, 'upon the hearing of a charge under the section, a child of tender years, who is tendered as a witness, does not, in the opinion of the Court, understand the nature of an oath, but is possessed of sufficient intelligence to justify the reception of the evidence, and understands the duty of speaking the truth; the evidence of such child may be received, though not given upon oath. [Provided that any witness, whose evidence has been admitted under this section, shall be liable, in all respects, to indictment and punishment for perjury as if he or she had been sworn]' (mm).

IV. c. 82 (Separatists), was repealed in 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 33). As to the mode of ascertaining whether a witness is entitled to affirm, see R. v. Moore. Each of these Acts specifically puts false affirmations in the same position as false oaths with respect to the penalties for perjury.

(j) Perjury by a witness for the Crown was held to be criminal at common law (3 Co. Inst. 164), but not under the Act of Elizabeth (post, p. 525). Witnesses for the to Children Act, 1904 (4 Edw. VII. c. 15), as to offences under that Act and offences named in the first schedule thereto. This continues in force as to offences within sects. 2, 3 of the Act, but as to other offences is superseded by sect. 30 of the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67). That section applies to offences against Part II. of the Act and named in Schedule 1 (n), and provides, '(b) Any child whose evidence is received as aforesaid and who wilfully gives false evidence under such circumstances that, if the evidence had been given on oath, he would have been guilty of perjury, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be liable on summary conviction to be adjudged such punishment as might have been awarded had he been charged with perjury and the case dealt with summarily under section ten of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879' (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49) (nn).

Judicial Proceeding.—The oath must be taken either in a judicial proceeding, or in some other public proceeding of the like nature, before persons authorised by the King to examine witnesses on any matter whatsoever (o). It is not material whether the Court, in which the oath is taken, is a Court of record or not, or whether it is a Court of common law, of equity, or of the civil law, or an ecclesiastical court (p), &c., nor whether the oath is taken in the face of the Court, or out of it before persons authorised to examine a matter depending in it, as before the sheriff or his lawful deputy or under-sheriff, on a writ of inquiry, &c., or whether it is taken in relation to the merits of a cause, or in a collateral matter, as, where one who offers himself to be bail for another, swears that his substance is greater than it is (q).

There must be something in the nature of a judicial proceeding, e.g., an existing cause (r). But the oath may be the first step for initiating the proceeding, e.g., swearing an information, or swearing an affidavit in support of an ex parte motion, or swearing a petition in a divorce cause, or an affidavit to support a summons to hold to bail (s). In the case of perjury in an affidavit or the like, the offence is committed when the deponent takes oath to the truth of the affidavit, and it is unnecessary to aver or prove that the affidavit was filed or in any way used (t).

It is no defence that the affidavit, through defects in the jurat, cannot be received in the Court for which it is sworn. Upon an indictment for perjury, in an affidavit, it appeared that the affidavit was signed with the mark of the defendant, and the jurat did not state either where it was sworn, or that the affidavit was read over to the party, and it was proved by a clerk in the Master's office that where the party swearing an affidavit cannot write, the jurat ought, after stating the place where it was sworn, to state that the witness to the mark of the deponent had been first duly sworn, that the person administering the oath had read over the affidavit to the deponent, and saw the mark affixed; and that no affidavit would be received which did not contain this form of jurat when the party could not write. Littleale, J., said: 'The omission of the form directed by this and other Courts to be used in the jurat of affidavits may be an objection to their being received in the Court, whose rules and regulations the party has neglected to comply with; but I am of opinion that the perjury is complete at the time the affidavit is sworn, and although it cannot be used in the Court for which it is prepared, that nevertheless perjury may be assigned upon it' (u). So where an affidavit when sworn had been marked by the judge's clerk with his initials, but through mistake had not been then presented to the judge for his signature, but some days afterwards it was signed by the judge; Alderson, B., in the presence of the other Barons of the Exchequer, expressed a clear opinion that perjury might be assigned upon the affidavit, although the judge's signature was omitted (v).

Upon an indictment for perjury, it appeared that the defendant had filed a bill in chancery for an injunction, and had made the affidavit, on which the perjury was assigned, in support of the allegations in that bill. The indictment averred the bill to have been filed, and the affidavit exhibited in support of it; and stated the matters assigned as perjury to be material to the questions arising on the bill; but did not contain any statement that a motion had been made for an injunction, nor did it appear by the evidence that any such motion had in fact been made. It was submitted that the defendant was entitled to an acquittal (w). Tenterden, C.J., said: 'I do not think the averment or proof, the absence of which is objected to, can be necessary. The statements in the affidavit are material to the matters contained in the bill, which is for an injunction; and it may well have been filed in anticipation of a contemplated motion for an injunction, on which it might have been used. Can it make any difference that it afterwards turns out that the motion is not made? The crime, if any, is the same, morally, in each case; and I certainly shall not, where the objection is open hereafter, hold it necessary to give proof of a fact which does not vary the conduct of the party in taking the oath in question' (x). An affidavit sworn for the purpose of being used in a cause, but which is neither used nor filed, is nevertheless the subject of perjury (y).

(w) By the practice of the Court of Chancery, an injunction could not be obtained, except for want of an answer, or on the insufficiency of the answer, or on evidence disproving the answer, in none of which cases was the affidavit of the plaintiff admissible; or else ex parte before the time allowed to the defendant for answering has elapsed. In the last case, and in that only, could the plaintiff's affidavit be used. The averment, therefore, that the perjury was assigned on the matter material to the bill was not true; it could only be material to an application of a peculiar nature, and it did not appear, and was not alleged, that such an application was ever made. It was answered that the objection, if tenable at all, amounted to this, that perjury could not be assigned upon an affidavit which had not been used.

(y) Hammond v. Chitty, Q.B., E. T. 1846, MSS. C. S. G.

An indictment for perjury alleged that the defendant produced before a Master in Chancery an affidavit, 'entitled, in the said Court of Chancery, and in the said suit therein at the suit of the said E. J. C., and also in the said suit therein at the suit of the said Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland.' The affidavit, when produced, appeared to be entitled 'between the Commissioner (sic) of Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland, against J. E. D., &c. (naming the other defendants), and between E. J. C. and J. E. D., the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland, and others.' It was objected that this affidavit was not one on which perjury could be assigned, as there was no such suit as that in which the Commissioner of Charitable Bequests was plaintiff; and the affidavit was improperly entitled, as the names of all the defendants were not stated, and therefore the affidavit was not admissible in the Court of Chancery. Denman, C.J., said: 'The Courts are quite right in not receiving affidavits which are not properly entitled; but I do not think the question whether there be perjury or not depends on the rule as to entitling being strictly complied with' (z).

In Amended Proceedings.—Where the powers of amendment of its proceedings possessed by a Court are limited, after an amendment has been made without jurisdiction the cause may be described as non-existent (a), or subsequent proceedings as coram non iudice: and perjury cannot be assigned on a false oath taken therein (b). In the statutes empowering the amendment of criminal proceedings it is expressly provided that witnesses shall be indictable for perjury committed after the amendments have been made (c). A proceeding is not the less judicial because of some defect, falling short of absolute want of jurisdiction. Thus perjury may be assigned on evidence given in support of an indictment for perjury, even though that indictment was subsequently held bad on the ground that it did not contain a sufficient assignment of perjury (d).

Competent Jurisdiction.—The oath must be taken before a competent jurisdiction, that is, before some person or persons authorised by English law to take cognisance of the proceeding in or for which the oath is

(d) R. v. Meek, 9 C. & P. 513, Williams, J. The former indictment, also for perjury, had been held bad on a writ of error, because the assignment of perjury was insufficient. See *R. v. taken, and to administer the oath. Thus a false oath taken in a court of requests, in a matter concerning lands, was held not to be indictable, that Court having no jurisdiction in such cases (e). And perjury cannot be assigned on an oath taken before persons acting merely in a private capacity (f), or before those who take upon them to administer oaths of a public nature, without legal authority for their so doing, or before those who are legally authorised to administer some kinds of oaths, but not those which happen to be taken before them, or even before those who take upon them to administer justice by virtue of an authority seemingly colourable, but in truth unwarrantable and merely void. But a false oath taken before commissioners, whose commission at the time was determined by the demise of the Crown, would be perjury, if taken before the commissioners had notice of the demise (g).

Coke (h) seems to have considered that the authority to administer the oath must be derived from a commission recognised by the common law, and doubts have often arisen as to the power of particular persons to administer an oath on which perjury could be assigned. By sect. 16 of the Evidence Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 99), 'every Court, judge, justice, officer, commissioner, arbitrator (i), or other person now or hereafter having by law or by consent of parties, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence, is hereby empowered to administer an oath to all such witnesses as are legally called before them respectively.'

There are numerous other enactments making false swearing before particular tribunals and in particular cases perjury or punishable as perjury (d). The only one of sufficient importance to be here set out is the Commissioners for Oaths Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 10), which by sect. 7 enacts that, 'Whoever wilfully and corruptly swears falsely in any oath or affidavit (e) taken or made in accordance with the provisions of this Act, shall be guilty of perjury in every case where if he had so sworn in a judicial proceeding before a Court of competent jurisdiction he would be guilty of perjury.'

This enactment extends to all affidavits taken in England for use in Courts in England (f), and also to oaths taken abroad for the purpose of a cause or matter in England, or the registration of a document in England, if taken before a British diplomatic or consular officer acting there, or a person having power to administer an oath there (g).

By sect. 9, any offence under this Act, whether committed within or without His Majesty's dominions, may be tried in any county in the United Kingdom in which the person charged was apprehended, or is in custody.

Provision is also made for punishing as perjury oaths taken before commissioners or tribunals appointed to take evidence for proceedings in other Courts, whether of the United Kingdom (h), British dominions (i), or foreign states (j).

Deputy Judges.—The question whether perjury can be assigned on evidence taken before the deputy of a judicial officer, depends on whether the deputy is lawfully appointed and acting. In the case of false swearing before a deputy coroner, acting in the absence of the coroner, it appears to be for the judge who tries an indictment for perjury to determine whether the occasion which entitled the coroner to appoint a deputy had arisen (m).

Justices of the Peace.—Where perjury is assigned on an oath taken before a justice of the peace it must be shewn that he had jurisdiction to deal with the matter in which the oath was taken. When he has jurisdiction to take evidence he can take it on oath (n). Where a charge is made in the presence of the accused (o), as to a matter in which the justices have jurisdiction, who is then and there called upon to answer it, as he lawfully may be according to the dictum of Lord Holt (p) . . . special terms, are read as merely giving cumulative powers in order to compel the attendance of an absent person, or to enable a case to proceed ex parte if he does not appear.

‘There is a marked distinction between the jurisdiction to take cognisance of an offence and the jurisdiction to issue particular process to compel the accused to answer it’ (t).

This is recognised by sect. 17 of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), which provides for conducting a preliminary inquiry, even in cases where a prisoner is brought before a justice without warrant on a charge of an indictable offence. And even where a man is illegally brought before justices upon a charge as to which they have jurisdiction (u), if he does not demand his release (whether from ignorance of the illegality or other cause), but proceeds with his defence, he is treated as having waived his objections, and witnesses who swear falsely at the hearing are liable to indictment for perjury (v).

H., a constable, was indicted for perjury, committed on the hearing of a charge against S. for assault upon H., and for obstructing him in the discharge of his duty. The first charge made was for an offence against 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 38, and on that charge the evidence was given, but the justices summarily convicted under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 12. On the trial of H. it was objected that he could not be convicted because the magistrates had no jurisdiction to hear the charge of assault, and therefore perjury could not be committed on the hearing. No written information or oath had been made before the issue of the warrant upon which S. had been brought before the justices; but H. took no objection to this although he defended himself on the merits, and called a witness on the facts. It was held that, although the warrant was illegal, the false oath taken by H. was perjury, because it was taken before justices who were competent to entertain the charge of assault, and had jurisdiction in respect of time and place over the offence. On a case reserved the conviction was affirmed (w). Hawkins, J., said: ‘I am of opinion that the conviction was right, and ought to be affirmed. In arriving at this opinion I have assumed as a fact, from the case as stated, that S. was arrested and brought before the justices upon as illegal a warrant as ever was issued,—a warrant signed by a magistrate not only without any written information or oath to justify it, but without any information at all. . . . Wrongful, however, as were the proceedings by which S. was brought into the presence of the magistrates to answer a charge which up to that moment had never been legally preferred against him; before those magistrates and in his presence a charge was made over which, if duly made, they had jurisdiction. Upon that charge it was that the hearing proceeded; and in support of that charge it was that the defendant was sworn, and in giving his evidence swore corruptly and falsely.' In the view of the Court it was immaterial to the charge of perjury whether the judgment given by the justices on the evidence was legal or illegal, so long as they had jurisdiction to hear evidence on the charge made.

Under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2 (x), an application for an order in bastardy must be made to the justices acting for the petty sessional division in which the mother 'may reside'; and they had no jurisdiction to entertain such an application, unless she did reside within their division, and consequently, if she did not so reside, perjury could not be committed on such an application (y).

Upon an indictment for perjury upon the hearing of an application by M. H. for an order upon the prisoner for the maintenance of her bastard child, it appeared that the summons was issued by a magistrate on the application of M. H., who stated, but not on oath, that she had been delivered of a bastard child more than twelve months previous, and that money had been paid by the prisoner for its maintenance within twelve months of its birth. The summons alleged that the prisoner had 'paid money for its maintenance within twelve months after its birth,' instead of stating that proof thereof had been made. The prisoner appeared personally in answer to the summons, and was assisted by an attorney. No objection was made to any of the proceedings on which the summons was founded, and the case was gone into on the merits before the stipendiary magistrate, before whom M. H. swore to the payment of money as alleged, and the prisoner swore that he had never paid M. H. any money. It was objected that, as there had been no proof on oath of money having been paid for the maintenance of the child within twelve months from its birth before the summons was issued, the magistrate had no jurisdiction to hear the case; but, upon a case reserved, it was held that the prisoner had waived the objection. Proceedings to obtain an affiliation order are not criminal but civil in character, taken to impose a pecuniary obligation, and the summons is mere process to bring the defendant into Court (z). Before the summons issued there ought to have been evidence on oath of the payment of the money, although it was not expressly required by the statute to be on oath, as in the case of a complaint made before the birth of the child. Further, the summons should have been in the form given by the statute; but even assuming that, if the prisoner had not appeared, the magistrate could not have lawfully proceeded to hear evidence of the paternity; or that, if he had appeared, and objected to the regularity of the summons, the objection

(y) R. v. Hughes, D. & B. 188. The mother of the child was delivered in March, and resided with her parents till November. She then went and lodged at D. in another petty sessional division for three weeks, and then applied to the justices of that division. Her lodging there was not for any improper or fraudulent purpose, but because the justices met in the town, and it was more convenient for her than to go a distance from her parents' house to the justices' meeting of the division in which her parents resided. After the order she went into service without returning home. The jury found that she had no other home than D., and that she was residing at D., if in point of law she could under the circumstances be considered to be so. It was held that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order, as her residence was at D.

ought to have prevailed; yet when he actually appeared, and instead of objecting to the regularity of the summons, asked the Court to give judgment in his favour on the merits, and tendered evidence to absolve himself from liability, he waived any irregularity in the process, and when he had thus submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the Court, the Court had jurisdiction to hear and decide the case (a).

The same principle has been adopted in the case of a bastardy summons issued before the birth of the child without the deposition required by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 (b). Where a bastardy summons is applied for within the statutory period, twelve months, but not issued till after it has elapsed, the justices have jurisdiction to hear the proceedings (c).

Upon an indictment for perjury, it appeared that the perjury had been committed upon the hearing of a second application for a bastardy order, a former application having been heard by the magistrates and dismissed upon the merits. It was contended that the magistrates were functi officio after the first application had been dismissed on the merits, and had no jurisdiction to entertain the second application. But it was held that the magistrates had jurisdiction to hear the second application and administer an oath, even if the previous dismissal were a defence (d).

On a trial for perjury alleged to have been committed on the hearing of an information for refusing to quit licensed premises, it was held that proof of the existence of the licence was necessary to shew that the justices had jurisdiction (e).

An indictment alleged that Horne was duly licensed to keep a beer-house, and that an information had been laid against him for that he, being duly licensed to keep a beer-house, had it open unlawfully on the morning of Sunday, February 6, 1853, and charged the defendant with falsely swearing that he had not been supplied with beer in the house on that morning. Horne's licence was for a year, commencing on May 11, 1853, but Horne was keeping the beerhouse on the February 6 previously. It was objected that the averment that Horne was duly licensed on February 6 was not proved, and that if he was not so licensed, the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the information. But Crompton, J., held that the justices had jurisdiction generally over the subject of keeping houses for the sale of beer and other liquors open on Sunday; and that as, in order to establish an offence, it was not necessary to prove that the keeper of the house was licensed, what was sworn on the subject of Horne's keeping the house open brought the case within the jurisdiction of the justices, even if it turned out that he was not licensed at the time (f).

was over, the former apprentice summoned his late master under this Act for wages alleged to be unpaid, and on the hearing swore falsely. It was held that this was perjury, inasmuch as the magistrate had jurisdiction to determine whether the relation of apprenticeship continued or not (g).

Justices have no jurisdiction to inquire into the truth of a charge of libel preferred before them, or to hear any other justification (h), except in cases within sect. 4 of the Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 60). If publication is proved, they are bound to commit for trial. Where, therefore, an indictment was preferred for perjury alleged to have been committed in the course of the cross-examination of a witness for the defendant on a charge of libel before magistrates, the object of which was to prove the truth of the libel, the Court directed an acquittal (i).

Materiality.—The essence of perjury is its tendency to mislead a Court in proceedings relative to a matter judicially before the Court (j). Consequently the false evidence must be relevant to a question already raised, or to be raised, in the proceeding; for if it is wholly foreign from the purpose, or altogether immaterial, and neither in any way pertinent to the matter in question, nor tending to aggravate or extenuate the damages, nor likely to induce the jury to give the reader credit to the substantial part of the evidence, it cannot amount to perjury, because it is wholly idle and insignificant; as, where a witness introduces his evidence, with an impertinent preamble of a story concerning previous facts, not at all relating to what is material, and is guilty of a falsity as to such facts (k).

If it appears plainly that the scope of the question to a witness was to sift him as to his knowledge of the substance, by examining him strictly concerning the circumstances, and he gave a particular and distinct, but wilfully false, account of the circumstances, he is guilty of perjury, inasmuch as nothing can be more apt to incline a jury to give credit to the substantial part of a man's evidence, than his appearing to have an exact and particular knowledge of all the circumstances relating to it (l). And a witness may be guilty of perjury in respect of a false oath concerning a mere circumstance, if such oath have a plain tendency to corroborate the more material part of the evidence; as if, in an action of trespass for spoiling the plaintiff's close with the defendant's sheep, a witness swears

(l) Upon an indictment for robbery committed on April 13, between eight and ten o'clock at night, a witness for the prisoner swore, not only was the prisoner at home at that time, but in answer to the judge said, that the prisoner had lived in the same house for the two years previous, and that during the whole of that time he had not been absent from the same house for more than three nights together. The last two statements were proved to be false, as the prisoner for a whole year of the period spoken to had been in prison. Held, that the evidence so last given was material to the inquiry, and the proper subject of assignments of perjury, inasmuch as those latter statements tended to render more probable the previous statements made, that the prisoner was at home on the night of April 13. R. v. Tyson, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 107. See R. v. Naylor, 11 Cox, 13; R. v. Alsop, 11 Cox, 264.

that he saw such a number of the defendant's sheep in the close ; and being asked how he knew them to be the defendant's, swears that he knew them by such a mark, which he knew to be the defendant's mark, whereas, in truth, the defendant never used any such mark (m). And it is not necessary to shew to what degree the false evidence was material to the issue, but it is enough that the point was circumstantially material (n). And still less is it necessary that the evidence should be sufficient for the plaintiff to recover upon, since evidence may be very material, and yet not conclusive upon, nor even directly probative of the point in question (o). Where A. advanced money to B. on two distinct mortgages, upon one of which the security was insufficient, and B. assigned the equity of redemption in both to C., who assigned the insufficient estate to an insolvent, and filed a bill against A. to redeem the other, to which bill A. put in his answer, and therein denied having had notice of the assignment to the insolvent ; it was held that the notice was a material fact upon which perjury might be assigned (p).

Materiality is not limited to direct relevance to the issues raised, or to be raised (q), in the proceeding for the determination of the tribunal, or to the principal judgment to be given (r). Thus, perjury may be assigned on evidence given to enable a judge to decide whether a document is admissible (s), or by a person who offers himself as bail for another, as to his possessing the necessary qualifications (t). Whether false swearing in a judicial proceeding with intent to mistead is not punishable, when it is wholly irrelevant and immaterial to the issue that is being tried, has not been judicially determined (u).

Upon the trial of Doe d. Richard v. Griffiths, a copy of the will of W. J. was tendered, and on objection to its admissibility, P., who was then attorney for the lessor of the plaintiff, swore that he had examined the copy produced with the original will in the registry at Llandaff. Upon further objection that the original will was inoperative in respect of a chattel interest, and that, therefore, either the probate ought to be produced or the Act Book be proved, P. further deposed that he had examined the memorandum at the foot of the copy of the will, with the entry in the Act Book at the same registry. Upon this evidence the judge offered to receive the document in evidence, but the plaintiff's counsel withdrew it. P. was indicted for perjury. It was proved that he had not made either of the examinations to which he had deposed, and he was convicted. Erle, J., reserved the question, whether the false oath was relevant case arose on an application to rescind a commission to examine witnesses' issue after writ but before the defendant's appearance. It had been urged that a commission should not go till issue was joined in the cause, as till this, perjury could not be assigned in the depositions.

and material to the issue then being tried, so as to amount to perjury ; as to which the following were the facts :—On the trial of an action of ejectment (Doe d. Richard v. Griffiths), the lessor of the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to a term, which had been granted to W. J. and R. M. jointly. The will of J. was irrelevant to this title ; but the time of his death was a material fact, and proof of the probate of the will of J. would thus have been relevant evidence towards establishing the plaintiff's title. A copy of this will was tendered in evidence. The purpose of the plaintiff's counsel in tendering the evidence, was to clear a doubt respecting the interest of J. in the term, which was expected to be raised by the defendant, and after the document was withdrawn the survivorship of R. M. was proved by other evidence. The examination of the document tendered with the entry in the book called 'The Act Book' at Llandaff, did not render the document legally admissible as an examined copy of the act of probate.

For the prisoner, it was contended before the judges, that the question was simply whether if a witness swears that he has examined a document, not receivable in evidence, with a certain book, can that be said to be material to the issue ? The time of J.'s death was in issue ; how could the fact that the witness swore that he had examined a paper, not receivable in evidence, with a certain book, be material to the issue then being tried ? It is not enough that the evidence has relation to the matter in issue ; it must be material to the issue. It was contended, when the defendant was tried, that what he had sworn was material for the jury, who were to act on the evidence before them ; and, secondly, that it was material for the judge, who was to say whether it was to be put to the jury or not. But it could not be material for the jury ; for it was withdrawn from their consideration, and they could not legitimately act upon it ; and here the judge was not a judge of fact. This evidence was not on any issue of fact which the judge had to try. It was merely evidence to be given to the jury through the judge. Campbell, C.J., said : ' I am of opinion that the conviction was right. There was false swearing in a judicial proceeding. How can it be said not to have been material ? It was necessary to prove that J. died before M. Although the fact of J.'s death had been proved by parol testimony, if evidence was given to shew that probate had been granted of J.'s will while M. was still living, it would have been material in corroboration. With a view to have the copy of the will received in evidence, the defendant swore falsely that he had examined the paper produced with the original will at Llandaff, and the entry on it with the entry in the Act Book ; and thereupon the judge said, I will admit it, and if it had been read, it would have gone to the jury with the rest of the evidence in the case. Afterwards the document is withdrawn, but that cannot purge the false swearing committed by the defendant. It has been said that if the judge were wrong in admitting the document in evidence, the defendant could not be convicted, making the offence of perjury depend upon whether a judge were right or wrong in his decision on a question of law, and upon the decision of some nice point in a bill of exceptions, which might ultimately go to the House of Lords. We are all of opinion, as the evidence was given in a judicial proceeding, with a view to the reception in evidence of a document, which was material, and as that evidence was false, that all the ingredients necessary to constitute the crime of perjury are present' (v).

The prisoner was indicted for perjury before a Court of Requests, in a proceeding under the interpleader section of the Act establishing the Court, to ascertain whether a certain pig, which had been seized under an execution issued against him on September 26, had been sold by him on August 5 to his brother. The prisoner had sworn that he had sold the pig to his brother on August 5, and the allegation of perjury was, that the pig was not sold by the prisoner to his brother on the said 5th day of August. It was contended that whether the pig was sold or not on August 5 was not the material question; the material question was whether or not, at any time before the issuing of execution, there had been a sale of the pig by the prisoner to his brother. It was quite immaterial whether the sale took place on a particular day, if it took place at some time prior to the execution. Maule, J., said: 'I think that the ultimate question to be decided is one thing, and yet that a material question may be raised upon a matter collateral to that question. I do not at all think that I can confine the law of perjury by making that only perjury which is material to the only question to be tried, otherwise persons might perjure themselves with impunity. It might be a material question in a case of murder what coloured coat a man had on: the colour of the pig, as I put it, might be most material; for suppose a person swore that this was a black pig, and another witness swore it was white, it would have been a material question whether the pig was black or white, although the ultimate question would have been whether it was sold at the time when it was alleged to have been sold' (w).

On the hearing of an information against R., under sect. 30 of the Game Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 32), for committing a trespass in pursuit of game on a close in the occupation of W., a witness having proved that he saw R. in W.'s field, and saw him commit the offence there, the prisoner swore, on behalf of R., that he went with R. into a lane adjoining the field, and that R. shot into the field, but did not enter it, and that he himself went into the field and fetched off what R. killed. On an indictment for perjury in respect of this evidence, it was contended that the evidence was not material; because R. was equally guilty of an offence within sect. 30, whether he went into the field and shot there, or whether he shot from the lane, and the prisoner in his company went in and brought away the game. But Williams, J., held that the evidence was material (x).

(v) R. v. Phillpotts [1851], 2 Den. 302. In the course of the argument, Maule, J., said: 'Here the defendant by means of a false oath endeavours to have a document received in evidence; it is, therefore, a false oath in a judicial proceeding; it is material to that judicial proceeding; and it is not necessary that it should have been relevant and material to the issue being tried.' In R. v. Gibbon, Pollock, C.B., said that there was a great deal of very good sense in Lord Campbell's judgment in this case. Cf. on this point, R. v. Mul- lany, L. & C. 593, post, p. 470.

(w) R. v. Altass [1843], 1 Cox, 17. A case once occurred at Gloucester where on an indictment for stealing a rabbit the question turned on whether a rabbit found in the prisoner's possession was a buck or doe rabbit, and numerous witnesses were called on each side, and the verdict was, 'We find it was a buck rabbit'—a case well illustrating Maule, J.'s remarks.

(x) R. v. Scotton [1844], 5 Q.B. 493. The case was not argued on this point in the Queen's Bench.

In R. v. Mullany (y), the perjury assigned was that the defendant, on the trial of a cause in a County Court, wilfully, corruptly, and falsely swore that his name was Edward and not Bernard Edward. On this evidence the County Court judge had refused an amendment and struck out the cause. On his conviction it was contended that the inquiry as to the prisoner's name was immaterial. But Erle, C.J., said: 'The question was put in the course of a judicial inquiry, and was so put by the judge in the course of forming his judgment on the case, and for his own guidance in forming such judgment. The prisoner thereupon swore that which was false. He swore it in a judicial proceeding for the purpose of affecting the decision; and the statement he made was material because on the strength of it the judge altered his judgment for the petitioner into one for the defendant. The case therefore clearly comes within the rule laid down in R. v. Phillpotts (z) and R. v. Gibbon' (a).

Upon an indictment for perjury alleged to have been committed in an answer to a bill filed in Chancery, it appeared that the bill was filed against the defendant and R., stating an agreement to purchase certain wheat, to be paid for by draft at three months, which agreement was not reduced into writing, and that afterwards a bought note was delivered to the defendant, which note did not contain fully the terms of the agreement; that the defendant brought an action and recovered a verdict; and that he was enabled to obtain such verdict by reason of his fraudulently concealing the true terms of the agreement, and the bill prayed that one of the terms of the contract might be declared to be that the purchase-money should be paid by a bill of exchange, payable three months after date; and the defendant by his answer denied the parol agreement stated in the bill. The bill was dismissed, and the denial by the defendant was the subject of the indictment for perjury. It was contended that the indictment could not be sustained on the ground that the only proper evidence of the contract was the bought and sold notes: that the contract by parol was void by the Statute of Frauds: and that a false answer to a bill for the discovery of such a contract would not subject a person to the indictment for perjury; and R. v. Dunston (b) was relied upon. Coleridge, J., said: 'In that case the bill in Chancery was to enforce the performance of a parol contract, which could not be enforced by reason of the Statute of Frauds; and the case of R. v. Benesech (c) proceeded on the same ground. Though it is true that a party cannot vary Denman, C.J., held the evidence of materiality insufficient, but as none of the evidence is stated, except the single question and answer on which perjury was assigned, it is difficult to see where this decision assists.

(b) Ry. & M. 109. Tenterden, C.J., held that perjury could not be assigned on the denial of the making of an agreement pleaded to relate to the sale of lands, and not enforceable by reason of s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds on the ground that the oath was irrelevant and immaterial.

(c) Peake, Add. Cas. 93. Kenyon, C.J., held that perjury could not be assigned on denial of a promise to pay a marriage portion, it being pleaded in the suit that the agreement to give the portion was not in writing, and was void under the Statute of Frauds. See Bartlett v. Pickersgill, 4 Burr. 2255; 4 East, 577n.; where a case of indictment for perjury for denial of a part agreement to buy land, which a Court of Equity had refused to enforce. The Statute of Frauds does not seem to have been pleaded.

the terms of a written contract by parol evidence, he may shew by such evidence that he was induced to sign the written contract inadvertently and by fraud. In this case the object of setting up the parol terms of the contract is for the purpose of avoiding the contract on the ground of fraud.' 'I think that the principle, that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written contract, does not apply where the object of that evidence, as in this case, is to impeach the transaction on the ground of fraud. I think that the assignment of perjury on the denial in the answer of the parol terms, which the bill prayed to have established, is material and relevant; and I think therefore that the objection cannot be sustained' (d).

In R. v. Courtney (e), an indictment for perjury before a coroner while holding an inquest, alleged that it was a material question whether the deceased, the prisoner, or another person had drunk any intoxicating liquor during a certain interval, and that the prisoner falsely swore that none of them had tasted any intoxicating liquor during that interval. This statement was shewn to be false, but there were no grounds for supposing that the deceased came to his death from anything except from the effects of having been exposed to the night air. It was objected that the matter so falsely sworn was not material, but Monahan, C.J., left the question of materiality to the jury, and they convicted; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the evidence was material. It was the duty of the coroner to inquire into all the circumstances attending, or which might have caused, the death of the person upon whom the inquiry was held. That being so, it at once became material to ascertain whether or not death had not been caused to some extent by the deceased having been tipping in a public-house, and therefore in a state to render it more probable that he should have lost his way. It was material for the coroner to ascertain, not only the actual cause of death, as murder, felo de se, or otherwise, but also all the circumstances attending it, and therefore it was a necessary part of his duty to ascertain the way in which the deceased spent the evening before his death (f).

In R. v. Berry (g), the prisoner was indicted for perjury alleged to have been committed by him on the hearing of an application of M. H., the mother of a bastard child, for an order in bastardy to be made upon the prisoner. Upon the hearing M. H. swore that on the day after the birth of the child the prisoner paid her £1 7s. 6d., and that he paid her

(f) In R. v. Ball [1854], 6 Cox, 360, Russell Gurney, Recorder, is reported to have said: 'In all these cases it is necessary to shew that the matter alleged to be falsely sworn was material. That cannot be done in this case without proof that it was material either to the action or to the other matters in difference. The evidence failing to shew this distinctly, the defendant must be acquitted.' The indictment was for perjury in an arbitration of a cause and all matters in difference. The perjury was assigned as to the signature of a paper. The arbitrator was unable to say definitely whether the answer related to matters in the cause or to other matters in difference. On this report, Mr. Greaves says: 'Gurney, R., is far too good a criminal lawyer to have made such a decision as this, and I have the best authority for saying that he never did so decide. Probably the evidence failed to shew that the evidence was material in any respect upon the hearing of the matters referred. It is obvious that the paper in this case might have been material both to the matter in issue in the cause, and to the other matters referred, and yet according to this report the evidence would not have been material.'

a weekly sum for several weeks after; in answer thereto the prisoner swore that he never paid M. H. any money at all upon any account whatsoever, and on this statement perjury was assigned. The statement was held material; as it was necessary to prove at the hearing the payment of the money; and as the payment of the money for the maintenance of the child was corroborative evidence of the paternity (h).

Where a count stated that it was a material question whether a bond was obtained by the fraud of the prisoner, and that the prisoner falsely swore that he read over and explained it to the obligor; Erle, J., ruled that the reading over the bond was material as being strong evidence to negative fraud (i).

On an indictment of B. for falsely swearing on a trial for rape that she had never got one W. to write a letter for her, which was shewn to her, it was proved that B. had got W. to write a letter to the person she had charged with the rape, saying, 'I will do all I can to clear you.' 'I should not have went to the police about the matter at all, if I had not been persuaded by' two persons whom she named, &c. The evidence relating to the writing of this letter was held material (j).

On an indictment for having falsely sworn before justices, on a charge against the prosecutor for stealing three account books, that the defendant saw him destroy another account book, the prosecutor being also charged with embezzlement; it was held that the evidence was not material on the charge of larceny, as it would be merely bad conduct in one instance, inducing a probability of bad conduct in another (k).

The prisoner was indicted for perjury on the hearing of a summons, which he had taken out against the prosecutor for using language calculated to incite him to commit a breach of the peace. The language used by the prosecutor was in consequence of H. having, as the prosecutor alleged, kicked and struck a horse, and several witnesses were called who proved this. H. was asked on cross-examination whether it was true that he had ever kicked or struck the horse, and denied that he had. Held, that the statement by the prisoner that he had never kicked or struck the horse was merely collateral (l).

All false statements wilfully and corruptly made by a witness as to matters which affect his credit are material, and he is liable to be convicted of perjury in respect of them. So where a person charged before a magistrate with selling beer without a licence, falsely swore that, when previously convicted of a similar offence, he had not authorised his solicitor to plead guilty, it was held that such a statement was material, as it affected his character as a witness, and that he was rightly convicted of perjury (m). The Court came to this conclusion on the authority of the three cases next to be cited, and considered that the fact and circumstances of the previous conviction were material not merely to the quantum of punishment, but to the formation of the decision of the magistrate on the case.

(h) In R. v. Owen [1852], 6 Cox, 105, perjury was assigned on the oath of O. on a bastardy summons, that R. was the father of her child, and that R.'s uncle had offered to raise her wages if she would swear the child to another man than R. It does not appear how this evidence came to be admitted by the justices. Martin, B., doubted its materiality, but left the case to the jury, who acquitted.

An indictment for perjury before commissioners of taxes on an appeal of H. against a surcharge for a greyhound used by him on November 24, averred that it was a material question whether a certain receipt produced by the prisoner on the hearing of the appeal was given to him before September 12, and that the defendant falsely swore that the receipt was given to him before September 12. At the commissioners' meeting, evidence was given that H. and the prisoner were coursing, on November 24, with two greyhounds, one of which had been H.'s, who had no certificate. H., in support of his appeal against a surcharge for this dog, said that the dog had been sold to the defendant long before, and called him as a witness. The prisoner swore that he bought the dog on September 6, and produced a receipt for the purchase-money bearing that date. The surveyor asked him whether the receipt was given at the time of the sale, and he said it was not, but a few days after. On being pressed, he swore positively that it was given him before September 12. It was objected that the materiality of the question as stated in the indictment had not been shewn; that the material question was, whether the dog was the defendant's or H.'s on November 24, the day of the coursing. It had not been disproved that there had been a sale of the dog on September 6, and if there was, the time of giving the receipt, or even the fact of any receipt having been given, was immaterial. The objection was overruled, and on a case reserved, Abinger, C.B., said: 'The whole matter turned on the credit of the witness, and he tries to support his credit by false evidence. The receipt is to confirm his evidence, and he swears it was given before the 12th. If that were true, the proof would be decisive.' Williams, J.: 'The time when this receipt was given is a step in the proof.' Denman, C.J.: 'Everything is material which affects the credit of the witness.' Abinger, C.B.: 'Every question in cross-examination which goes to the credit of the witness is material. If a witness were asked, in cross-examination, whether he was in such a place at such a time, and he denied it, that would be material if it went to his credit. In the present case, if they could not have contradicted the prisoner by the date of the stamp, the receipt confirming his evidence would have made out the case before the commissioners' (n).

In R. v. Gibbon (o), the prisoner was indicted for falsely swearing on the hearing of an application in bastardy, that he had had connection with the mother of the child. The mother in support of the application had made a deposition before the magistrates, and she was then cross-examined as to whether she had not had connection with the prisoner, and she denied it. The prisoner swore that he had had connection with her as imputed by the question put to her. It was objected that the evidence given by the prisoner was not material to the issue raised on the application for the affiliation order, as the question put to the mother as to her having had connection with the prisoner merely went to affect her credit, and her answer to it ought to have been regarded as conclusive, and the evidence given by the prisoner was inadmissible. But, on a case reserved, it was held that the prisoner was liable to be convicted. 'It is now clearly established that a cross-examination going to a witness's credit is material, and that perjury may be assigned upon it' (p). Here, therefore, the mother might have been indicted if she had sworn falsely on cross-examination upon this matter. 'Although it did not refer to the main issue, which was the paternity of the child, it had a bearing upon what was indirectly in issue; namely, how far the complainant was deserving of credit' (q). 'Then, as the question only affected her credit, as soon as she had answered it, all should have been bound by her answer. This is an established rule of our law. Notwithstanding that, the magistrates admitted the evidence of the prisoner, which legally was inadmissible. Then, although not legally admissible, yet, being admitted, it had a reference to what was indirectly in issue,—the credibility of the complainant. The evidence having been admitted, although wrongly, R. v. Phillpotts (r) is an authority directly in point that perjury may be assigned upon it. Although the evidence was open to objection, yet it does not lie in the witness's mouth to say that it was not a question on which he was bound to speak the truth' (s).

Is Materiality for Judge or Jury?—There are conflicting decisions on the question whether materiality is for the judge or for the jury.

In R. v. Lavey (t), the indictment alleged that the defendant, as

(s) By eleven judges, Crompton, J., and Martin, B., doubting. It was stated in the argument that the child was a full-grown child. The cases where it has been held on a trial for rape that the woman may be proved to have had connection with other men, were distinguished by Williams, J., on the ground that 'the character of the prosecutrix in those cases may be so mixed up with the facts as to be material, not only to her credit, but to the cause.' By counsel for the prosecution they were distinguished on the ground that voluntary intercourse with others was very material on the question whether she consented; and this distinction was not denied by any judge. The cases where in an action for seduction such evidence has been held admissible, were distinguished on the ground that such evidence affected the damages. But although Alderson, B., in Verry v. Watkins, 7 C. & P. 308, left such evidence to the jury in mitigation of damages, he first left the question to them whether the defendant was the father of the child, and my recollection of the case (in which I was counsel for the defendant) is that the evidence was given chiefly with a view to that question. And in Grinnell v. Wells, Gloucester Spr.

and Sum. Ass., 1843, the mother on the first trial swore to connection with the defendant on one occasion only; and on the second trial, before Williams, J., evidence of an alibi was given, and also evidence that the mother had had connection with others at such a time that one of them might have been the father of the child; and this evidence was given only with a view to the paternity of the child. The new trial had been obtained on the affidavit (amongst others) of the defendant expressly negating any connection with the mother. C. S. G. In R. v. Murray [1858], 1 F. & F. 80, B. had been charged before justices with robbery in a railway carriage. He had cross-examined the prosecutor as to whether he had been in company with B. and M. in Manchester on the previous day, and then called M., who swore that the prosecutor had accosted him while in company with B., and proposed that he should assist him in breaking into his uncle's house. Martin, B., after consulting Byles, J., held this to be evidence. On this case being cited in R. v. Gibbon, Martin, B., said, 'that case should not be looked upon as any authority. It was only my impression of what was material formed hastily on circuit.'

executrix of her husband, was plaintiff in a County Court action, and that she falsely swore that she had never been tried at the Central Criminal Court for any offence, and had never been in custody at the Thames police station. It was proved that she had been in custody at the station, and had been tried at the Central Criminal Court, and acquitted by the direction of the judge. The County Court action was for goods sold by the testator, and was heard by the judge without a jury, and the evidence in question was given by the plaintiff during her cross-examination. It was objected that the evidence given by the defendant was not material on the question whether the testator in his lifetime sold the goods for which the action was brought; and as the trial in the County Court was before a judge, and not before a jury, it did not weigh as to the result of that trial whether she had been tried or not; and since giving a true answer that she had been acquitted by the direction of the judge would have equally cleared her character, it could not have been material that she denied having been taken into custody and tried on that charge. Campbell, C.J., said: 'I think that there is evidence of materiality,' and left that question to the jury, directing them to consider whether her evidence on the two points in question might not influence the mind of the County Court judge in believing or disbelieving the other statements she made in giving her evidence (u).

In R. v. Courtney (v), where on an indictment for perjury before a coroner a question was raised as to the materiality of the matter sworn, and that question was left to the jury, who convicted; it was held, in Ireland, that the matter was material: and all the judges except one (w), after fully considering the preceding case, expressed a very strong opinion that it was for the judge to determine whether the matter was material or not.

In R. v. Goddard (x), the indictment alleged that on the hearing of an application for an order in bastardy, it became material to inquire whether the prisoner had ever kissed the prosecutrix or had familiarity with her. The prisoner, being examined in answer to the evidence given by the prosecutrix, swore that he never had any connection or familiarity with her, and never kissed her. It was objected that the evidence was not material, as it was far too wide in the form in which it was given. Wightman, J., consulted Erle, C.J., and declined to stop the case, and after pointing out the necessity for two witnesses to prove the falsehood of the prisoner's evidence, told the jury: 'Then the question arises whether the parts of his evidence which are assigned as perjury were material to the investigation. It seems to me that they were so, but that is for you. Were they material and wilfully false?' These decisions appear to be

(u) In every previous case materiality has been treated as a question of law, and it is submitted that it is clearly so; otherwise all the cases in which it has been held that an averment of materiality is unnecessary where the materiality appears on the face of the indictment, are erroneous.

(w) Ball, J., doubted. It is to be observed that in this case all the judges held the evidence to be material; they did, therefore, treat the question as a matter of law. If they had held it to be a question for the jury, the question would have been whether the evidence warranted the verdict. See this case more fully stated, ante, p. 471.

in conflict with R. v. Gibbon (y). Channell, B., on that case said he never could understand R. v. Lavey, 'unless on the ground that there was a question whether the defendant in the County Court action meant to plead or admit the claim. That point having been ascertained, the question of materiality was no longer for the jury.'

Deliberation.—The false evidence must be given wilfully, i.e., with some degree of deliberation. It cannot be regarded as wilful or corrupt perjury if given through surprise or inattention or mistake (z). And upon a trial for perjury it is necessary to shew that the prisoner's attention has been sufficiently drawn to the exact question put to him (a), and that the matter deposed to was then known to be false, or not known to be true.

It does not matter whether the fact deposed to is in itself true or false; even if the thing sworn may happen to be true, yet, if it were not known to be so by him who swears to it, his offence is as great as if it had been false, inasmuch as he wilfully swears that he knows a thing to be true which at the same time he knows nothing of, and impudently endeavours to induce those before whom he swears to proceed upon the credit of a deposition which any stranger might make as well as he (b).

Nor does it matter whether the falsity relates to something which the witness swore he saw or heard or did, or to what he swore he thought, or knew or remembered, or believed. It is certainly true that a man may be indicted for swearing that he believes a fact to be true which he must know to be false (c). In R. v. Schlesinger (d), an indictment for perjury alleged that the defendant swore that he thought that certain words written in red ink were not his writing; whereas the defendant, when he so deposed, thought that the said words were his writing; and it was held that the assignment was sufficient. If a witness swears that he thought a certain fact took place, it may be difficult indeed to shew that he committed wilful perjury. But it is certainly possible, and the averment is as properly a subject of perjury as any other.

In R. v. Stolady (e), the prisoner was indicted for perjury on the hearing of an information against B. for trespassing in pursuit of game. The occupier of the land and two of his men swore that they saw B. on the land on a particular Sunday morning. The prisoner was called by B. as a witness, and swore that B. lodged with him, and that he never was absent from his lodgings on any Sunday morning during the whole time that they lodged together, which included the Sunday on which

The opinion expressed by Coke that perjury cannot be assigned on an oath as to opinion, recollection or belief (3 Inst. 166) must, therefore, be regarded as erroneous. But perjury could hardly be assigned on an opinion on such a matter as the construction of a deed. See R. v. Crespigny, 1 Esp. 280, Kenyon, C.J.

the alleged offence was committed. Pollock, C.B., was of opinion that the attention of the prisoner ought to have been called to the particular day on which the transaction took place as to which he was asked to speak; and that a general allegation, such as had been made in this case, including all Sundays between two fixed dates, was not sufficiently precise upon which to found an indictment for perjury, and directed an acquittal (f).

In R. v. London (g), the indictment charged that prisoner (on the trial of a plaint in the County Court for the price of coals obtained on credit at different times, in which it was a material question whether or not the prisoner had received any coals on credit from P., either on account of himself or A.), swore 'that he had never received any coals on credit from P., either on account of himself or A.' Held, that the allegation in the indictment was not too general, although no specific instance was averred in which the prisoner had received coals on credit from P. At the trial the prisoner was asked three or four times by the advocate and judge whether he did at any time, either on his own account or that of A., have any coals on credit from P., to which the prisoner always answered, 'I did not.' It was held, that the prisoner's attention was sufficiently called to the subject so as to found a charge of perjury upon the answer, although no distinct transactions on credit were suggested to him during his examination (h).

Corrupt Motive.—Perjury is always charged as having been committed 'corruptly,' as well as 'wilfully.' The word 'corruptly,' even if it be not essential at common law (hh), is inserted in indictments to justify the statutory punishments provided for wilful and corrupt perjury (i).

The corrupt motive may be inferred by the jury from the circumstances

(f) 'This case is very unsatisfactorily reported; no date is given, or anything more than is above stated. As the proof of the offence was on "a particular Sunday morning," the prisoner, if present, must have had his attention drawn to that particular date; and, if absent, still the date would have been known to B. from the summons, and, as he called the prisoner as his witness, he no doubt had communicated the day to him, so that the ground of the decision really did not exist. But supposing the decision to be as reported, it is very confidently submitted that it is erroneous. Suppose a man called to prove an alibi swears that he and the prisoner were in Paris during all the month in which the offence was committed, can it be the law that he is not guilty of perjury because he is not asked as to the particular day? If a man swears that he was not absent from church on any Sunday in January, is not that as precise a swearing as to each and every Sunday as if he were asked as to each in succession? An information, which charges the defendant with killing ten deer between July 1 and Sept. 10, without shewing the particular days on which they were killed, is good. R. v. Chandler, 1 Ld. Raym. 581. And where, on a similar information, the evidence was that the defendant did, within such a time and such a time, steal a deer, so that the time was left as uncertain in the evidence as in the information, it was held sufficient. R. v. Simpson, 10 Mod. 248.' C. S. G.

(g) 12 Cox, 50 (C. C. R.).

(h) Bovill, C.J., said: 'We are all of opinion that this conviction was good. The first question is upon the form of the indictment, that is sufficient in our opinion. The second point is whether the attention of the prisoner was sufficiently called to the transaction he was being questioned about, and we are all of opinion it was amply called to it, even if the second point had been reserved for us.' Willes, J., said: 'We do not intend to overrule what Pollock, C.B., said, "that the attention of a witness ought to be called to the point upon which his answer is supposed to be erroneous, before a charge for perjury can be founded upon it." Mr. Greaves in the 4th edition of Russell on Crimes, makes some observations on R. v. Stodady, which are in accordance with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.'

of the case (j), and in order to shew that the accused swore wilfully and corruptly what was not true, evidence may be given of expressions of malice used by the defendant towards the person against whom he gave the false evidence (k).

Where an indictment for perjury alleged that the prisoner 'feloniously' swore to the matter on which the perjury was assigned instead of 'falsely,' it was held that the indictment was bad in substance, and that the words 'corruptly, knowingly, wilfully, and maliciously,' did not supply the defect: a man might swear 'corruptly' under some corrupt influence, and yet swear the truth; so with respect to the word 'knowingly'; and he might swear 'wilfully and maliciously' to gratify some malicious feeling, but yet it might not be 'falsely.' Nor did the conclusion that the prisoner 'in manner and form aforesaid did commit wilful and corrupt perjury' cure the defect; for the meaning of that was, that the prisoner committed the offence in the manner stated, and, that statement being defective, the indictment was bad (l).

Trial.

Perjury is now tried only on indictment or criminal information, except in those cases in which a child of tender years allowed to give unsworn evidence may be summarily convicted (vide ante, p. 457).

In one old case, where a person made an affidavit in the Court of Common Pleas, and afterwards, being summoned to appear in Court, came there, and confessed it to be false, the Court recorded his confession, and ordered that he should be taken into custody, and put in the pillory. In answer to the objections of the defendant's counsel to this proceeding, it was argued that it was fully justified under 5 Eliz. c. 9, and that even if the Court could not punish the defendant by virtue of that statute, he might be punished at common law, on the ground that any Court might punish such a criminal for an offence committed in facie curiæ (m). This ruling appears to treat perjury or prevarication as a form of contempt of Court (n).

Courts of Quarter Sessions had no jurisdiction to try common law perjury (o). They were given jurisdiction by 5 Eliz. c. 9 (post, p. 525). But by the Quarter Sessions Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 38), s. 1, Courts of Quarter Sessions have no jurisdiction to try 'any person or persons for . . . perjury or subornation of perjury'; or 'making or suborning any other person to make a false oath, affirmation, or declaration punishable as perjury, or as a misdemeanor' (p).

See also R. v. Rigby, 8 C. & P. 770.

(p) It is to be observed that the word 'try' is used, and under this Act it would seem possible for the grand jury at quarter sessions to find an indictment for perjury but for the provisions of the Vexatious Indictments Act, which in effect ensure commitment of charges of perjury to a court of assize

It is the practice of the Central Criminal Court not to try an indictment for perjury arising out of a civil suit while that suit is in any way undetermined, except in cases in which the Court, where the suit is pending, postpones the decision of it in order that the criminal charge might first be disposed of (q).

Where two justices refused to hold a preliminary inquiry into a charge of perjury alleged to have been committed in a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, on the ground that that suit was still pending, a mandamus to compel them to hear the charge was refused, and it seems to have been considered that the course the justices had taken was the most likely to answer the ends of justice (r).

Punishment.

The punishment of wilful perjury by a witness is at common law (s) fine and (or) imprisonment without hard labour. The amount of the fine and the term of imprisonment are in the discretion of the Court (t). By the Hard Labour Act, 1822 (3 Geo. IV. c. 114) (u), the imprisonment may be with hard labour. The Court may also adjudge the defendant to give surety to keep the peace and be of good behaviour for a reasonable time, to be computed from and after the expiration of the term of his imprisonment, himself in a sum named in such judgment, with two sufficient sureties, each in a sum therein also mentioned, and may adjudge the defendant to be further imprisoned until such security be given; and such sentence does not amount to perpetual imprisonment, as in default of sureties being given the defendant would be entitled to be discharged at the expiration of the term during which the sureties were required (v).

By the Perjury Act, 1728 (2 Geo. II. c. 25), s. 2, in order the more effectually to deter persons from committing wilful and corrupt perjury, or subornation of perjury, it is enacted, 'that besides the punishment already to be inflicted by law for so great crimes, it shall and may be lawful for the Court or judge, before whom any person shall be convicted of wilful and corrupt perjury, or subornation of perjury, according to the laws now in being, to order such person to be sent to some house of correction within the same county for a time not exceeding seven years (w), there to be kept to hard labour (x) during all the said time, or otherwise to be transported to some of His Majesty's plantations

II. c. 25, s. 2, infra); and be now beyond the seas, for a term not exceeding seven years (y), as the Court shall think most proper; and thereupon judgment shall be given, that the person convicted shall be committed or transported accordingly, over and beside such punishment as shall be adjudged to be inflicted on such person, agreeable to the laws now in being (z); and if transportation be directed, the same shall be executed in such manner as is or shall be provided by law for the transportation of felons.' The section goes on to provide that 'if any person so committed or transported shall voluntarily escape or break prison, or return from transportation before the expiration of the time for which he shall be ordered to be transported as aforesaid, such person, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer death as a felon (a), without benefit of clergy, and shall be tried for such felony in the county where he so escaped, or where he shall be apprehended.'

The old law (b) disqualifying a person convicted of perjury from giving evidence was abrogated by the Evidence Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, s. 1). 2 Geo. II. c. 25, s. 2, applies to false oaths punishable as perjury taken in a manner authorised by subsequent statutes (c), and under it successive sentences of seven years penal servitude may be imposed on conviction on two or more counts charging perjury by the defendant on different occasions, although in each case with the same object (d).

The first count of an indictment assigned perjury on an affidavit of the defendant, which alleged that the defendant did not retain or employ W. U. to act as attorney for him and J. I., or for either of them, in and about the business mentioned in the said W. U.'s bill of costs; and that he, the defendant, never retained or employed the said W. U. to act as attorney or agent for him in any cause or manner whatever. The second count assigned perjury on the statement in the affidavit as follows: 'that he the said defendant did not retain or employ (meaning that he the defendant did not alone, or jointly with the said J. I., retain or employ) W. U. to act as attorney for him and J. I.' The third count was the same as the first, and the fourth as the second. The plea was, not guilty of the premises in the indictment specified. The venire was 'to recognise whether the defendant be guilty of the perjury and misdemeanor aforesaid, or not guilty.' The verdict was that the defendant 'is guilty of the perjury and misdemeanor aforesaid,' and the judgment that the defendant 'be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for ten calendar months.' It was urged that the venire, the verdict and judgment, were uncertain for not shewing to which of the counts they referred: that they were in the singular number, speaking of 'the perjury and transportation, the clause seems to be superseded by 5 Geo. IV. c. 84, s. 22, and the death penalty under that section was repealed in 1834 (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 67), in terms which seem wide enough to cover the above clause.

misdeameanor aforesaid,' and that this could only mean one perjury and misdeameanor; and that as four were alleged in the indictment, it was uncertain which of them the jury was summoned to try, and of which of them the defendant was found guilty; but the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer Chamber held that 'misdeameanor' was nomen collectivum, and meant 'the misconduct aforesaid,' and that consequently the venire applied to all the counts of the indictment, and the defendant had been found guilty by the verdict on all the counts (e).

Where on an indictment for perjury containing several counts the judgment was 'that the prisoner for the offence charged upon him in and by each and every count be imprisoned for the space of eight calendar months now next ensuing'; it was held by the Court of Exchequer Chamber that the judgment was good, on the ground that it meant that the prisoner was to be imprisoned for the same period of eight months for each offence (f).

Ordering Prosecution.—By the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 100), s. 19, 'it shall and may be lawful for the judges or judge of any of the superior courts of common law or equity, or for any of His Majesty's justices or commissioners of assize, nisi prius, oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, or for any justices of the peace, recorder, or deputy recorder, chairman, or other judge holding any general or quarter sessions of the peace, or for any commissioner of bankruptcy or insolvency, or for any judge or deputy judge of any county court, or any court of record, or for any justices of the peace in special or petty sessions, or for any sheriff or his lawful deputy before whom any writ of inquiry or writ of trial from any of the superior courts shall be executed, in case it shall appear to him or them that any person has been guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury in any evidence given, or in any affidavit, deposition, examination, answer, or other proceeding made or taken before him or them, to direct such person to be prosecuted for such perjury, in case there shall appear to him or them a reasonable cause for such prosecution, and to commit (g) such person so directed to be prosecuted until the next session of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery for the county or other district within which such perjury was committed, unless such person shall enter into a recognisance, with one or more sufficient surety or sureties, conditioned for the appearance of such person at such next session of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery, and that he will then surrender and take his trial, and not depart the court without leave, and to require any person he or they may think fit to enter into a recognisance, conditioned to prosecute or give evidence against such person so directed to be prosecuted as aforesaid, and to give to the party so bound to prosecute a certificate of the same being directed, which certificate shall be given without any fee or charge, and shall be deemed sufficient proof of such prosecution having been directed as aforesaid; and upon the production thereof the costs of such prosecution shall and are hereby required to be allowed by the court before which any person shall be prosecuted or tried in pursuance of such direction as aforesaid, unless such last-

Form of Indictment.—Besides the general rules of the common and statute law as to criminal pleading, indictments for perjury and cognate offences are subject to the following enactments:—

14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 20. 'In every indictment for perjury, or for unlawfully, wilfully, falsely, fraudulently, deceitfully, maliciously, or corruptly taking, making, signing, or subscribing any oath, affirmation, declaration, affidavit, deposition, bill, answer, notice, certificate, or other writing, it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant, and by what Court or before whom the oath, affirmation, declaration, affidavit, deposition, bill, answer, notice, certificate, or other writing, was taken, made, signed, or subscribed, without setting forth the bill, answer, information, indictment, declaration, or any part of any proceeding, either in law or in equity, and without setting forth the commission or authority of the Court or person before whom such offence was committed' (i).

Sect. 21. 'In every indictment for subornation of perjury, or for corrupt bargaining or contracting with any person to commit wilful and corrupt perjury, or for inciting, causing, or procuring any person unlawfully, wilfully, falsely, fraudulently, deceitfully, maliciously, or corruptly to take, make, sign, or subscribe any oath, affirmation, declaration, affidavit, deposition, bill, answer, notice, certificate, or other writing, it shall be sufficient, wherever such perjury or other offence aforesaid shall have been actually committed, to allege the offence of the person who actually committed such perjury or other offence in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, and then to allege that the defendant unlawfully, wilfully, and corruptly did cause and procure the said person the said offence, in manner and form aforesaid, to do and commit; and wherever such perjury or other offence aforesaid shall not have been actually committed, it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant, without setting forth or averring any of the matters or things hereinbefore rendered unnecessary to be set forth or averred in the case of wilful and corrupt perjury.'

Sect. 22. 'A certificate containing the substance and effect only (omitting the formal part) of the indictment and trial for any felony or (h) As to costs in England, see 8 Edw. VII. c. 15, post, Bk. xii. c. v. Subject to this enactment perjury and subornation are within the Vexatious Indictments Act, post, Bk. xii. c. i.

(i) This section is almost identical in terms with 23 Geo. II. c. 11, s. 1, except that it omits the words "averring such misdemeanor, purporting to be signed by the clerk of the Court or other officer having the custody of the records of the Court where such indictment was tried, or by the deputy of such clerk or other officer (for which certificate a fee of six shillings and eightpence and no more shall be demanded or taken), shall upon the trial of any indictment for perjury or subornation of perjury be sufficient evidence of the trial of such indictment for felony or misdemeanor, without proof of the signature or official character of the person appearing to have signed the same' (j).

Court or persons to have a competent authority to administer the same.' 23 Geo. II. c. 11 was repealed in 1867 (S. L. R.). R. v. Dunning, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 290, 292; 40 L. J. M. C. 58, Channell, B. As to the inadequate use made of that enactment, see R. v. Dowlin, 5 T. R. 311.

Several persons cannot be joined in one indictment for perjury, the crime being in its nature several (k).

Venue.—In an indictment for perjury the marginal venue is sufficient (l) and it is enough to shew the offence committed anywhere within the county, without naming the parish or place where the false oath was taken. Where perjury had been committed in the booth-hall within the limits of the city of Gloucester, which is a county of itself, on the trial of a cause before a jury of the county at large, it was held that the indictment might be found and tried by juries of the county at large (m). And where perjury had been committed on the trial of an indictment at the Worcester quarter sessions, which were held in the Guildhall at Worcester, which is situate in the county of the city of Worcester, it was held that the indictment, which was found by the grand jury of the county of the city of Worcester, was good, as it was preferred in the county where the oath was actually taken (n). Where perjury was assigned on an affidavit of an attorney of the Court made in answer to a summary application against him, it was objected that it was not stated where the Court was held when the original application was made, or when the rule was made, calling upon the defendant to answer the charge. But the venue was held to have been sufficiently stated, it being expressly averred that the defendant 'then and there before the said Court was duly sworn' (o). In the case of an affidavit sworn in the country the party at common law could not be indicted where the affidavit is used, but only where the offence was completed by making the false oath (p). But in the case of affidavits sworn under the Commissioners of Oaths Act, 1889, the deponent may be indicted in any county or place in the United Kingdom in which he was apprehended or is in custody (q).

(j) The complete record would be equally good evidence; but production of the indictment alone has been held insufficient. R. v. Coles, 16 Cox, 165, Stephen, J.

(k) R. v. Philips, 2 Str. 921. 'In R. v. Goodfellow, C. & M. 569, one defendant was indicted for perjury, and the other for suborning him to commit the perjury, and no objection was taken to both being included in the same indictment; and it would seem none could have been successfully taken on that ground, as it is like the case of principal and accessory before the fact, included in the same indictment.' Time.—The indictment need not state the time at which the offence was committed unless the time is of the essence of the offence (r), and if averred where it is not material, it may be rejected (s). Where an indictment for perjury, charged to have been committed in the defendant's answer to a bill of discovery filed in the Court of Exchequer, alleged that the bill was filed on a day specified, it was held that the day was not material, as it was not alleged as part of the record (t). Where perjury was assigned on an answer to a bill alleged to have been filed in a particular term, and a copy produced was of a bill amended in a subsequent term, by order of the Court, it was held that the amended bill was part of the original bill (u). On an indictment for perjury committed on the trial of a cause at nisi prius which contained no express reference to the record, it was held immaterial that the nisi prius record stated the trial to have been on a day different from that stated in the indictment (v).

Description of Court.—It is necessary to aver by what Court or before whom the oath was taken, but unnecessary to set forth the commission or authority of the Court or person (w). The description of the Court should, of course, be accurate, especially if it is a Court of limited jurisdiction; but may be amended if there is a variance between the statement and the evidence as to something not material to the merits of the case (x). The enactments mentioned above have lessened, if not destroyed, the authority of the cases in which certain variances have been held fatal, e.g., where the indictment charged perjury before justices assigned to take the assizes (y), and the evidence shewed that the judge was sitting under the Commission of Oyer and Terminer, and Gaol Delivery (z), or where the indictment charged perjury at the assizes and general sessions of Oyer and Terminer, and the evidence proved the oath to have been taken on the Crown side, and not on the civil side (a).

Talford, J., ordered the words in brackets to be struck out to make the indictment correspond with the record of the former trial.

In R. v. Western, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 122, the Court held that the indictment could be amended by substituting the description of the court of justices for a borough instead of justices for a county. The justices were named in the indictment.

(a) See the precedents, 2 Chit. Cr. L. 366, 367 (a), of indictments for perjury on the trial of causes at the assizes, which are in the form of this indictment; though, according to 3 Bl. Com. 60, the commission of assize is to take the verdict of a peculiar species of jury, called an assize. Blackstone also speaks of a commission of assize being issued each circuit; but no such commission is now issued, and the cases tried on the civil side are tried under the commission of assize. And this is according to what Lord Holt said (Bullock v. Parsons, 2 Salk. 454): 'The authority of the judge of nisi prius is not by the distringas, but by the commission of assize; for it is

An indictment for perjury may state the trial to have taken place before the judge, who in fact tried the case, or before the judges before whom it is considered in point of law to have taken place (b).

An indictment alleged that an issue was tried before the sheriff of the county of Durham, by virtue of a writ to him directed, and that upon the trial of that issue the prisoner was duly sworn before the said sheriff. By the writ of trial, return, and the record, the issue did appear to have been tried before the sheriff; but by the parol evidence it appeared that the issue was not tried before the sheriff or under-sheriff, and that neither of them was present, but that it was in fact tried before S., who was stated to be the deputy of the high-sheriff; but no appointment of S. was put in, nor was his office more particularly described. Wightman, J., upon being informed that it was the invariable practice when writs of trial were directed to the sheriff, to make up the record as if the trial had been before him, though in fact it was before some deputy, allowed the trial to proceed, and the prisoner was convicted; and, upon a case reserved, the majority of the judges held that the conviction was right (c).

Description of the Proceedings.—It is not necessary to set forth in detail any part of the proceedings in which the false oath is said to have been taken (d). It is enough to aver that there was a certain cause, &c., and that it came on to be tried in due form of law (e); and even before 1851 it was sufficient to recite the substance and not the tenor of the record of the former proceeding (f).

An indictment for perjury, alleged to have been committed before a Court of Quarter Sessions, averred in substance that a certain indictment 13 Edw. I. c. 30 which gives the trial by nisi prius, and by that statute the trial by nisi prius is given before justices of assize.' It is clear, therefore, that where perjury is committed either on a civil or criminal trial at nisi prius on circuit the trial ought to be alleged to have taken place before the justices assigned to take the assizes. C. S. G. In R. v. Fairburn (Stafford Summer Assizes, 1850, MSS. C. S. G.) the indictment charged perjury before justices assigned to take the assizes. The record proved that the former trial had taken place at the assizes and general sessions of oyer and terminer. Greaves, Q.C., ruled that this was not a fatal variance, as the indictment for rape might have been removed by certiorari and tried on the civil side. But the record went on to say that the trial was in the Crown Court, which was held fatal, and not amendable under 9 Geo. IV. c. 15, now superseded and extended by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 1. As to the proper mode of describing the tribunal on indictments for perjury in a county court or before a committee of Parliament, see Lavey v. R., 2 Den. 504: 3 C. & K. 26. R. v. Dunn, 12 Q.B. 1026. As to describing a common-law county court, see Jones v. Jones, 5 M. & W. 523. R. v. Fellows, 1 C. & K. 115.

(b) R. v. Alford, 1 Leach, 150. The indictment was for perjury at the assizes (civil side). Two judges were named in the commission and in the caption of the indictment. The point was reserved and decided as stated in the text. Cf. R. v. Coppard, M. & M. 148, which turned on the now obsolete practice as to trials in sittings after term in London; and R. v. Deman, 2 Ld. Raym. 1221.

(c) R. v. Dunn, 2 Mood. 297, followed in R. v. Schlesinger, 10 Q.B. 670. In R. v. Child, 5 Cox, 197, the indictment alleged a trial for felony before the judges named in a commission of oyer and terminer, &c. It had, in fact, taken place before Greaves, Q.C., in the grand jury room. Mr. Greaves was a J.P. for the county in which the assizes were held. Talfourd, J., expressed a doubt whether his authority to try the case sufficiently appeared in the indictment.

for misdemeanor (g), &c., came on to be tried in due form of law, and was tried by a jury duly sworn, and the prisoner, as a witness on the trial, was duly sworn, and contained the other usual averments and conclusion. It did not state the nature of the misdemeanor, or aver that the Court of Quarter Sessions had authority to try the same or administer an oath on the trial. It was held, that the substance of the offence charged against the defendant was sufficiently stated under this enactment, and that the indictment was good on motion in arrest of judgment (h).

But enough should be stated to shew that the proceeding in or for which the oath was sworn was judicial, and the oath not a voluntary oath (i). Most of the older authorities (j) on this subject may be disregarded, as superseded by the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, and the power of amendment by that Act given.

Where an indictment for perjury alleged that a certain issue in a plea of debt came on to be tried, and that upon the trial of the said issue so joined between the parties, certain questions became material, &c., but by the record it appeared that three issues had been joined on three pleas; it was objected that it was impossible to know to which of them the averment of materiality referred; but Erle, J., held that 'issue' was nomen collectivum, and overruled the objection (k).

In R. v. Pearson (l), it was held insufficient to aver that P. went before two justices and deposed to assault on him and the taking of a £5 note from him by M., without stating that there was any proceeding pending before the justices, or that the deposition was taken in support of a charge of crime, on the ground that the statement made was consistent with P. having merely made a voluntary affidavit, where there was no charge and no prosecution and no cause in hand (m). But in R. v. Bradley (n), Coleridge, J., said that considerable doubts had been raised in R. v. Gardiner (o) whether R. v. Pearson was rightly decided.

Jurisdiction of the Court.—Before 1851 it was necessary expressly to allege, or clearly to indicate in the indictment, that the Court or person before whom the oath was taken had authority to administer the oath for the purpose of the proceeding in which it was taken. Under 14 & 15 Vict.

(g) It is expedient to specify the nature of the offence to which the first trial related. Where the indictment charged perjury on the hearing of a charge of feloniously receiving stolen silk, and the evidence shewed that the charge was for having possession of silk suspected to have been purloined or embezzled (17 Geo. III. c. 56), Patteson, J., held that the indictment was not proved. R. v. Goodfellow, C. & M. 569.

c. 100, s. 20, this strictness is relaxed, and the competence of the Court is matter of proof (p). It is not necessary to set out the commission or authority of the Court or person (q). But where the Court, &c., is of limited jurisdiction (r) enough should be stated to shew that its jurisdiction attached (s). In the case of an oath taken before justices of the peace, the indictment should specify the justices before whom it was sworn, and for what place and purpose they were acting (t).

On an indictment charging the commission of perjury on the hearing of an appeal, before commissioners of assessed taxes, that a notice of appeal had been given to the 'assessors,' whereas, under the relevant statute (43 Geo. III. c. 99), the notice of appeal was to be to the surveyor or commissioners, and the commissioners were to dismiss the appeal unless such notice had been given (s. 25), it was held, that the indictment on the face of it shewed want of jurisdiction to hear the appeal (u). In cases of perjury on affidavits before commissioners of oaths, the circumstances under which the oath came to be administered should be stated (v).

In R. v. Callanan (w), an indictment for perjury in an affidavit alleged that the defendant did take his corporal oath before F. J. C. (he the said F. J. C. then and there having sufficient and competent power and authority to administer the said oath to the defendant in that behalf), and that the defendant did before the said F. J. C., as such commissioner as aforesaid, depose, &c. The indictment did not state the cause for or in respect of which the affidavit was made (w). It was contended (in arrest of judgment) that the indictment was bad, as it did not describe the official station of the person before whom the defendant was sworn. It was, indeed, stated that he made affidavit of certain matters before F. J. C., as such commissioner as aforesaid; but he had not been before mentioned as a commissioner, and therefore that averment could not cure the defect. Abbott, C.J.: 'Looking at the Act of Parliament, 23 Geo. II. c. 11 (x), we find that all that is required to be set out in indictments for perjury is the substance of the offence charged, and by what Court or before whom the oath was taken, averring such Court or person to have competent authority to administer the same, without setting forth the commission or authority of the Court or person before whom the perjury was committed. It is, therefore, to be considered whether the present indictment has set forth all that is required by the statute. It sets forth the substance of the matter sworn, the person before whom the oath was taken, and avers that he had authority to administer it. The indictment does, therefore, contain all that is required by the words of the statute; and taking into consideration the object of the Act, which was framed to remove the difficulties before felt by reason of the averments and matters which were usually set out in indictments for perjury, we ought not to require more than the words of the legislature have made necessary. When a case of this sort comes on for trial, the prosecutor must prove the situation of the person before whom the oath was taken, and the nature of his authority. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the indictment is sufficient if it contains the name of the person, if the defendant was sworn before a person, or of the Court, if he was sworn before a Court. There is not, then, any reason for granting this application' (y).

The contrary rulings in R. v. Lewis, 12 Cox, 163, and R. v. Willis, 12 Cox, 164, seem to be erroneous. In Ryalls v. R. the argument turned on the use of the word 'month' in the indictment, in referring to proceedings under s. 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, in which the words 'calendar month' are used. At common law month is presumed to mean lunar month. Vide ante, p. 3.

In Overton v. R. (z), the indictment stated that at the time of the taking of the false oath by J. O. thereafter mentioned, R. L., F. D. P., and H. S. G. were commissioners of assessed taxes in and for the district of the hundred of K., in the county of W., and thereupon heretofore, to wit, on, &c., at, &c., in the district and county aforesaid (at a meeting then and there held by the commissioners aforesaid for the purpose of hearing and determining appeals against the certificate of supplementary charges made by one J. L., crown surveyor, in pursuance of the said Acts), a certain appeal of one W. H. of C., in the district and county aforesaid, in due form of law came on to be heard. The indictment then averred that the defendant on, &c., at, &c., appeared before the said commissioners as a witness for and on the behalf of the said W. H., on the hearing of the said appeal, and was then and there sworn, &c., before the said R. L., F. D. P., and H. S. G., so being such commissioners as aforesaid, that the evidence which he the defendant should give upon the hearing of the

(y) This case having been much relied upon in Overton v. R., infra, and the record examined, I have thought it right to insert the following statement of the first count, which I took from the record. The indictment stated that C. C., contriving and intending to injure one T. S., and in order to obtain a rule of the Court of B. R., whereby it might be ordered by the said Court that the said T. S. should shew cause why a certain judgment signed on a warrant of attorney in a cause in the said Court of S. against C., and the execution issued thereon, should not be set aside, and the said warrant of attorney be delivered up to be cancelled, and why the proceeds of the said execution should not be restored to the said C. C., and why the said T. S. should not pay the costs of that application, and that in the meantime the said proceeds should remain in the hands of the sheriff of the county of Middlesex, came in his proper person, &c., on, &c., at, &c., before F. J. Chell, gentleman, and the said defendant then and there, to wit, on, &c., at, &c., was duly sworn, F. J. Chell (he the said F. J. Chell then and there having sufficient and competent power and authority to administer the said oath to the said C. C. in that behalf), and the said C. C. being so sworn as aforesaid, falsely, &c., did then and there before the said F. J. Chell, as such commissioner as aforesaid, depose, swear, and make affidavit in writing, amongst other things, in substance, &c. The indictment then set out the affidavit: 'all which said several matters and things so deposed and sworn by the said C. C. as aforesaid were, and each of them was material for the obtaining and supporting the said rule.' C. S. G.

said appeal should be the truth and nothing but the truth (they the said commissioners then and there having authority to administer the said oath, &c.). The indictment then proceeded to aver the materiality, the giving the evidence, &c. The defendant having been convicted, a writ of error was brought, and one of the errors assigned was, that it did not appear that the said appeal was an appeal against such a certificate as in the said indictment mentioned, or that the same appeal was such an appeal as the said commissioners or any of them had power, authority, or jurisdiction to determine, and if they had no such power, &c., they had no jurisdiction to administer the said oath. The indictment was held bad upon this ground, and the judgment reversed (a).

In R. v. Lavey (b), it was said that in Overton v. R. the Court considered that there was no averment that the oath was administered in the course of a judicial proceeding.

In R. v. Lavey (b), the indictment alleged that 'a certain action of contract' was pending in a County Court, and that the defendant was duly sworn before the judge of the said Court, 'then and there having sufficient and competent authority to administer the said oath to her in that behalf.' It was objected that there was no averment that the action was one over which the County Court had jurisdiction, and that no intendment could be made that an action pending in an inferior Court was one over which the Court had jurisdiction. But the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the alleged defect, in the averment of the substance of the charge was supplied by necessary implication by the averment of the competency of authority in the judge to administer the oath, which necessarily implied that he had jurisdiction over the action (b).

This decision was followed in the Irish case of R. v. Lawlor (c), where an indictment for perjury at quarter sessions in Ireland alleged that a certain civil bill came on to be tried in due form of law before an assistant barrister, and alleged the oath to have been taken before the said assistant barrister, he having sufficient and competent authority to administer the said oath; an objection that the indictment ought to have stated that the civil bill was for a cause of action within the jurisdiction of the Court was overruled.

In Walker v. R. (d), the indictment alleged that a petition for protection from process was, under and in pursuance of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 93, and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 102, filed and presented in the County Court of Staffordshire at W. by the prisoner; and that the prisoner afterwards duly received an order for protection from process, and that afterwards, whilst the proceedings upon and in respect of the said insolvency were pending in the said County Court, to wit, at the time of filing the said petition and schedule, the prisoner came before H. K., at the Court at W., and within the jurisdiction aforesaid, for the purpose of making (a) Many other errors were assigned, but not determined by the Court.

(b) Ex. Ch. 17 Q.B. 496. See the indictment, 3 C. & K. 26. Overton v. R., supra, was mainly relied on, in support of the objection, and the Court observed; 'If it were necessary for us to say how we should decide the present case if it were not distinguishable from that, we should require further time for consideration.'

an affidavit and verifying on oath his said petition and schedule (H. K. being a commissioner to administer oaths in chancery, and duly empowered to act in the matter of the said insolvency, and to take the oath of the prisoner), and was duly sworn and took his oath that the affidavit he then made was true (H. K. having competent authority to administer the said oath). The indictment then alleged the materiality of certain matter, and that the prisoner falsely swore, &c. It was objected on error that the indictment did not shew that there was jurisdiction to administer the oath, as it did not allege that the prisoner had resided within the jurisdiction of the Court for six calendar months next preceding the filing of the petition as required by 10 & 11 Vict. c. 102, s. 6 (rep.). But it was held that the indictment was good (e).

In R. v. Dunning (f), R. v. Callanan and Lavey v. R., were accepted as laying down the correct rule as to describing the offence.

The Mode of Taking the Oath.—Every count should expressly state that the defendant was sworn (g). It is enough to say that he was duly sworn (h). Where it was averred that he was sworn on the Gospels, and he appeared to have been sworn in the Scotch form, without kissing the book, the variance was considered fatal, but the averment was held to be proved by its appearing that he was previously sworn in the ordinary mode (i).

The indictment should aver that the defendant 'wilfully and corruptly' swore (j). In R. v. Stevens (k) the first count of the indictment stated that the defendant on the trial of an indictment against J. H., intending to injure J. H., and to cause him to be wrongly convicted, appeared as a witness and was sworn, and 'then and there falsely and maliciously gave false testimony against J. H., by then and there deposing and giving evidence,' &c. The fifth count, the only one that differed materially from the first, alleged that by means of the false testimony in the first count mentioned, J. H. was found guilty; that a rule nisi for a new trial was granted; that the defendant, intending to hinder the said rule from being made absolute, came before a commissioner and was sworn, and being so sworn, wickedly, wilfully, and corruptly did depose, swear, and make affidavit in writing, in substance that the evidence which he, J. S., had given on the said trial was true; whereas the evidence which the said J. S. had given on the said trial was not true, but was false in the particulars in the said first count of this inquisition assigned and set forth. The defendant having been convicted, a rule was obtained for arresting the judgment, and after argument, Abbott, C.J., delivered the judgment of the Court as follows: 'I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. As to the first class of counts, the objection is that they do not charge that the defendant swore wilfully or corruptly. Every definition of perjury is swearing wilfully and corruptly that which is false. Whether the word maliciously might supply the place of either wilfully or corruptly, it is not necessary to determine, for neither of those words is found in the counts in question, and Cox's case (l), which has been referred to, proves at all events that such counts are insufficient. I now come to the consideration of the last count. It is in a form perfectly novel; it was intended to allege perjury in an affidavit made in this Court. In the ordinary course of pleading, the first step would have been to charge that there had been a trial, and that the defendant was sworn as a witness; the second, that he swore such and such things; the third, that the matter was false, and so on. Here there is no distinct averment that the defendant was sworn as a witness, or of what he swore. But it is said that the fact of his having been sworn must be taken by intendment. Were we to do that, as we are desired to do, in support of this indictment, we should furnish a precedent for a very loose and insufficient mode of charging a very serious offence, which has always hitherto been required to be charged with great certainty and particularity. I think that these novel attempts in pleading are not to be encouraged, and that the judgment must be arrested.'

(e) Wightman, J., said: 'Suppose the petitioner, not so residing, had sworn in his petition that he did; would that be perjury?' It was admitted that it would. Lord Campbell, C.J.: 'Then such a petition would give the Court jurisdiction to inquire into the truth of the petition in that respect.'

The False Evidence.—It has never been necessary in indictments for perjury (as it is in libel) (m) to set out the tenor of what the defendant is alleged to have sworn. In indictments for perjury 'whether in an affidavit (m) or in oral evidence (n) it is sufficient to state the substance and effect of the false oath' (m). But where such evidence is not continuous the indictment should not set it out as continuous, but should indicate that the statements alleged to be false were separated by other intervening evidence. Even where it is set out as continuous without shewing that it was not so in fact, the variance between the indictment and evidence has been held not to be fatal, unless the intervening matter varies the effect of the matter set out (m). An indictment for perjury committed on the trial of an action for assault and battery, charged the defendant with having sworn that the plaintiff spat in the defendant's face before the defendant struck him, and that he, the defendant in the indictment, had not said certain words, and assigned perjury on both statements. The evidence given by the defendant on the former trial contained all the matter charged as perjury, but other matter intervened between the statement as to the spitting, and that as to the words. Abbott, C.J., held that what intervened did not vary the effect of what was stated (n).

Where a count in an indictment for perjury set out continuously the substance and effect of what the defendant swore when examined as a witness, Ellenborough, L.C.J., held it necessary in support of this count, to prove that in substance and effect he swore the whole of that which is thus set out as his evidence, although the count contains several distinct assignments of perjury. It was urged in support of the prosecution that reddendo singula singulis, the defendant was charged with swearing separately in answer to all the questions that were mentioned in the indictment. But Ellenborough, C.J., said: 'Suppose you had undertaken to set out the tenor of what the defendant swore, and it should appear by the evidence that he had not sworn a material part of that which was set out, would not this have been fatal? Having taken upon you to state the substance and effect of what he swore, you are not bound down to precise words; but must you not prove that he swore in substance and effect the whole that you have stated? You aver that part of the defendant's evidence concerning the assurance given by Lord H. to be material, and you have not proved that he swore to any such assurance. Did you ever know the rule reddendo singula singulis applied to a misrecital? Is there any authority to shew that under secundum substantiam you are not bound to prove the substance of what you state, as under secundum tenorem you are bound to prove the tenor? To hold otherwise would be to introduce a most dangerous latitude into criminal proceedings. I am decidedly of opinion that you have failed in the proof of a substantial allegation. It is essential to the security of innocence that words set out in the record should be either literally or substantially proved. A person giving his assurance generally and giving his assurance for the performance of a particular stipulation, are allowed to be entirely different. If a man swears falsely to several material questions, these may be included in distinct counts' (p). But this decision is questionable (q).

An indictment for perjury alleged that the prisoner falsely swore to 'in substance and to the effect following,' and then set out in totidem verbis and in the first person a deposition of the prisoner in the English language. It appeared that the prisoner was examined in Welsh through an interpreter, and that his examination was translated into English, taken down in writing, and signed by the prisoner; and this written

For the general principles upon this subject, vide 2 Hawk. c. 46, ss. 34, 35, 36. Compagnon v. Martin, 2 W. Bl. 790.'

(q) The count upon which the question in R. v. Leefe turned, alleged that a committee was appointed and met to try the merits of a petition complaining of an undue election, that certain questions were material, and that the defendant swore 'touching the said material questions, and the merits of the said petition,' in substance and effect as follows: that he, by the directions of J. L., waited upon Lord H. and proposed to the said Lord H. that the said J. L. would decline upon the expenses being paid him, including the previous expenses of the day before; that Lord H. agreed that the said expenses should be paid, including the expenses that had been incurred at different inns in the town; that J. L.'s voters were to be applied to in consequence of that arrangement for the purpose of voting for the said Lord H., and that the defendant enumerated the expenses; that the defendant upon his return to the committee of the said J. L. communicated to them what had so passed between the said Lord H. and him; and that the said committee dispersed to carry the said agreement into effect; and that the said J. L. asked the defendant if the expenses were secured; and that the defendant told the said J. L. his lordship had given his assurance that it should be so. The assignments of perjury negated each of these statements, and it was proved that everything alleged was sworn, except the last words 'that it should be so.' As it is clearly settled that a defendant may be convicted of any one distinct assignment of perjury, though acquitted of all the rest (see p. 502), there seems no reason why proof of having sworn the matter negated by one assignment should not be sufficient. In the case of obtaining goods by false pretences, it is clearly settled that proof of any one false pretence, is sufficient, vide post, Vol. ii. p. 1575 et seq.; and that is a stronger case, because there the indictment in fact avers that all the pretences operated towards the obtaining the goods. C. S. G. See R. v. Rhodes, 2 Ld. Raym. 886, post, p. 502, note (z).

deposition was set out in the indictment. It was submitted that the evidence ought to have been set out in Welsh with a translation in English. Williams, J., said : ' In perjury it is only necessary to prove " the substance and effect." ' The indictment charges that the prisoner deposed and swore in substance and to the effect there stated. It was not necessary in this indictment to have set forth the deposition in totidem verbis ; still the substance and effect of what the prisoner swore in the Welsh language may be proved ; and if that is in substance and to the effect the same as is stated in this indictment, that will be sufficient ' (r).

An indictment stated that upon a certain information upon oath, entitled ' the information,' &c., the defendant wilfully deposed in substance and to the effect following : ' the defendant (meaning C. D.) I am certain is one of the persons that assaulted and ill-treated my wife,' &c. The information began, ' The information and complaint of J., the wife of C. E. G., and of the said C. E. G., made on oath,' &c. ' And first, the said J. G. for herself saith that the defendant is one of the persons who assisted W. J. S. and others in handcuffing and otherwise assaulting me on,' &c. (Signed) ' J. G.' ' And the said C. E. G. sworn says, " the defendant, I am sure, is one of the persons that assaulted and ill-treated my wife," ' &c. It was held that, as what the defendant swore was set out in substance, it was sufficient (s).

Where an indictment for perjury alleged that an officer of excise went before two justices of the peace, and gave the said justices to understand and be informed that ' W. S., victualler, being a brewer of beer or ale for sale,' did neglect to make a declaration of the quantity of beer brewed ; and the words in italics were not found in the information when produced ; the variance was held fatal, as the meaning of the indictment was that ' S. being a brewer neglected' (t).

Ambiguity.—If an indictment uses a word of equivocal meaning the meaning in which it is used must be collected from the context of the sentence in which it occurs. An indictment for perjury alleged that a commission of bankruptcy was issued against the defendant, under which he was duly declared bankrupt, and that afterwards he preferred a petition to the chancellor, stating (amongst other things) that a commission had issued, that the petitioner, on March 1, 1821, was declared bankrupt, and that at the several meetings before the commission the petitioner declared that the bill of exchange (on which the commission had issued) was not due, &c. But the allegation in the petition was that at the several meetings before the commissioners the petitioner declared that the bill was not due. It was contended that the words ' commission ' and ' commissioners ' were not convertible terms ; that the word ' commission ' denoted the authority under which the parties acted, and therefore the variance was fatal. Abbott, C. J., said : ' The objection is that there is a variance between the petition set forth in the indictment and that which is given in evidence at the trial. Now, in a proceeding of this kind it is not necessary to set out in the indictment verbatim the tenor of the petition ; it is sufficient if it be set out truly in substance and effect. The petition, as set out in the indictment, purports that at the several meetings before the commission, the petitioner declared in the hearing of the said assignee that the bill of exchange given to G. D. for the debt was not due at the time when he struck the docket. Now the allegation in the petition, which was proved in evidence, was that at the several meetings before the commissioners the petitioner declared so and so, and the question is whether that is a fatal variance. The word "commission" is one of equivocal meaning; it is used either to denote a trust or authority exercised, or the instrument by which the authority is exercised, or the persons by whom the trust or authority is exercised. And if it may denote the persons exercising the authority, we must collect from the context of the sentence in which the words "before the commission" occur, and of the other parts of the petition, whether it was used in that sense or not.' After stating the indictment the chief justice proceeded: 'Now, if the word commission as there used was intended to denote the commission itself, it would follow that the several meetings took place before any commission issued; but that is impossible, because in that case the petitioner could not have made his declaration in the hearing of the said assignee. Then, if that cannot be the meaning of the word commission, we must construe it in the other sense which it is capable of bearing, namely, as denoting the persons to whom the authority was given; and if it be so construed, there was no variance between the petition set forth in the indictment and that which was given in evidence; the consequence is, that there must be judgment for the Crown' (u).

In an indictment for perjury the averment stated that the prisoner swore he saw W. 'about fifteen minutes after the hour of 11 o'clock in the forenoon,' whereas it was proved that he had sworn that he saw W. about a quarter past eleven on the day in question, without stating whether it was the forenoon or the afternoon. Day, J., held that the averment in the indictment was not proved, and directed an acquittal (v).

Where a complaint having been made ore tenus by a solicitor in the Court of Chancery, of an arrest in returning home after the hearing of a cause, the indictment stated that, 'at and upon the hearing of the said complaint,' the defendant deposed, &c. This was held a sufficient averment that the complaint was heard (w).

Materiality.—Averments of materiality are not rendered unnecessary by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 20 (ante, p. 482) (x), and an omission of such an averment, when it is needed, appears to be a matter of substance not curable by amendment (y). Either it must clearly appear on the face of the indictment (z), or it must be therein expressly alleged that the matter, in respect whereof perjury is assigned, was material, not merely might be material (a). It is, however, enough to allege that the particular question became a material question without setting forth in the indictment so much of the proceedings of the former trial as will shew the materiality of the question on which the perjury is assigned (b). Thus statements, that, at a Court of Admiralty Sessions, J. K. was 'in due form of law tried upon a certain indictment then and there depending against him' for murder, and that 'at and upon the said trial it then and there became and was made a material question,' whether, &c., were held sufficient averments that the perjury was committed upon the trial of J. K. for the murder, and that the question on which the perjury was assigned was material on that trial (c).

In R. v. Nicholl (d), Parke, J., said: 'It is part of the definition of perjury that the false swearing is on some point material to the question in issue. In an indictment this may appear either from the matter of the suit, as shewn on the record, or by direct averment.' And in R. v. Cutts (e), Campbell, C.J., said: 'An indictment for perjury must either shew that the evidence alleged to be false was necessarily material to the issue, or there must be a positive averment that it is material.' Where, upon an indictment for perjury on a trial for felony, it was not alleged, and did not appear that the matter sworn was material, it was held, that if the original indictment had been set out, and it could plainly have been collected that the matter was material, the indictment would have been sufficient without an averment of materiality, but that as this was not the case the indictment was bad (f). Where an indictment assigned perjury on defendant's denial (in an answer in Chancery) that he had agreed, upon forming an insurance company of which he was a director, &c., to advance £10,000 for three years to answer any immediate calls, and there was no averment that this was material, nor did it appear for what purpose the bill was filed, to which the answer had been sworn, nor what was the prayer, judgment was arrested (g).

An indictment for perjury alleged that on the trial of a certain issue the defendant was sworn as a witness, and that on such trial certain questions became material, that is to say, 'whether one J. K. had been arrested by one J. L.; whether the said J. L. had on the occasion of the said alleged arrest touched the person of the said J. K.; and whether the said J. L. had on the occasion of the said alleged arrest put his arms round the said J. K. and embraced him.' The indictment then charged that the defendant swore falsely to the following effect: 'L. (meaning the said J. L.) put his arms round him (meaning the said J. K.) and embraced him (meaning the said J. K., and meaning thereby that the said J. L. had on the occasion to which the said evidence applied, touched the person of the said J. K.).' A writ of error was brought by the defendant

Bayley, J. The indictment was shewn to Lord Gifford, M.R., and Mr. Bell, K.C., who both thought that upon the face of the indictment it could not be said whether the question was material or not; and the materiality of all questions in a chancery suit depending upon the purpose for which the suit is instituted, the Court held that the indictment could not be supported. MS. Bayley, J.

on conviction, and the error specially assigned was that the materiality of the evidence alleged to have been false was not sufficiently averred in the indictment; and it was contended that in the evidence, on which the perjury was assigned, there appeared neither time, place, nor circumstance to connect the statement with the alleged arrest. The whole might have turned upon some former and entirely different transaction. And the innuendoes did not remove the difficulty; for there was no averment in them that it was on the occasion of the alleged arrest; it merely imported that the evidence was given concerning an occasion, which was not identified with that in question. Bayley, J., said: 'An indictment must be good without the help of argument or inference. In the case of perjury the indictment must shew either by a statement of the proceedings or by other averments, that the question to which the offence related was material. That is not shewn here in either way. The words on which perjury is assigned, if taken without the innuendoes, have no necessary reference to the occasion of an alleged arrest; nor is there anything in the indictment to connect them with it. It is contended that the inquiry, to which part of the evidence was an answer, would not have been relevant if applicable to any other matter and occasion than those now in question; but we know nothing of the merits of the case except from the indictment. The innuendoes rather introduce greater doubt than greater certainty, and lessen the force of the argument that only one occasion could have been contemplated. I am, therefore, of opinion that the indictment is defective, and the judgment ought to be reversed' (h).

Where an indictment stated that a suit was pending in the Court of Chancery, and that a commission was issued to certain commissioners to examine witnesses upon interrogatories, and then set out the ninth interrogatory, and averred that 'upon the examination of the defendant upon the said interrogatories, it became, and was, material to ascertain the truth of the matters hereinafter alleged to have been sworn to and deposed by the defendant, upon his oath, in answer to the said ninth interrogatory'; it was objected that the averment of materiality was insufficient, there being no statement of the alleged perjury being material to the chancery suit, or to any question in that suit. Coleridge, J., expressed some doubt whether the averment of materiality was sufficient, and would have reserved the point if it had become necessary (i). And where an indictment for perjury, after alleging that an information was exhibited before two magistrates, and that the same information came on to be heard before M. G. and J. S., two justices, and that 'upon the hearing of the said information before the said M. G. and J. S., so being such justices as aforesaid, it became and was material to ascertain the truth of the matter hereinafter alleged to have been sworn to and stated by the said J. S. upon his oath'; it was held that this averment of materiality was insufficient (j).

An indictment stated that, on the trial of an action of Meek v. Knight, 'it became and was a material question, whether a certain bill of exchange, bearing date, &c.' (here the bill was described) 'was accepted by the said J. M., for the accommodation of the said W. K., and without valuable consideration to the said J. M. from the said W. K. ; and whether a certain paper writing or memorandum, then and there produced, by and in the handwriting of the defendant, J. B., was really and truly executed by the said W. K., by affixing his mark thereto at the time of the making of the said bill of exchange ;' (the indictment then set out the memorandum) 'and whether the said memorandum was read over by the said J. B. to the said W. K., at the time of making the said bill of exchange as aforesaid.' The indictment then alleged that the defendant swore that the said paper writing or memorandum was duly executed by the said W. K., by affixing his mark to the same, in the presence of the said J. B., on the day on which the same bears date and at the time of the making of the said bill of exchange, and that the said memorandum was then and there read over by the said J. B. to the said W. K. 'Whereas, in truth and in fact, the said W. K. did not execute the said paper writing or memorandum by affixing his mark thereto, in the presence of the said J. B., on the day on which the same bears date, nor was the said memorandum read over by the said J. B. to the said W. K. at the time of the making of the said bill of exchange, nor was the said memorandum produced or shewn to the said W. K. by the said J. B., at the time of making the said bill of exchange.' Upon a writ of error, brought after a general verdict of guilty, the errors assigned were, that no perjury was assigned upon the question alleged to have been a material question upon the trial, and that no perjury was assigned upon any question alleged to have been a material question upon the trial ; and the Court of Queen's Bench held that the indictment was bad. The assignment of perjury, that the bill was not executed on the day on which the same bore date, departed from the statement of the evidence, and the allegation of its materiality. And the assignment of perjury, that the paper was not executed at the time of the making of the bill, bore no relation to the allegations of the evidence of the defendant. The statement of the evidence of the defendant, as well as the allegation of the falsehood, were uncertain, as the words 'then and there' might refer to the two dates, the date of the memorandum and the day of the making of the bill, and it might be consistent with the fact that it never was read over on both days, or the defendant might never have intended to say that it was (k).

An indictment alleged that E. S. filed his bill in chancery against the prisoner, J. S. S., and J. S., whereby he prayed that a purchase by the prisoner might be declared fraudulent and void, and that he might be decreed to deliver up the contract to be cancelled, and then averred

(k) R. v. Burraston, 4 Jurist, 697. The Court expressed strong doubts whether it was possible to separate the three propositions, which were said to have formed one question ; and Littledale, J., said that if it was one assignment of perjury, and part was bad, the whole was vitiated. It was also doubted whether where a matter was stated to be a material question the prosecutor could abstain from stating any swearing as to such matter, or assigning any perjury upon it. But it became unnecessary for the Court to decide either of these points, as the indictment was held bad on the grounds stated in the text.

that it then and there became a material question whether the prisoner did advise the said J. S., E. S., and J. S. S., that certain real estate, including the premises described in the said bill, should be sold. It was held that the averment of materiality was insufficient. There might be very good reasons for setting aside the sale as fraudulent, quite independently of any advice given by the prisoner; and that being so, the question was whether there was a sufficient averment of materiality, and the words 'then and there' were not sufficient to supply the omission of the words 'in the said suit,' or words to the same effect (l).

An indictment for perjury alleged that H. L. stood charged before T. S., a justice of the peace, with having on August 12 committed a trespass by entering in the daytime on certain land in pursuit of game, and that upon the hearing of the said charge, the prisoner appeared as a witness for the said H. L., and was duly sworn to speak the truth touching the said charge; and that the prisoner upon the hearing of the said charge, falsely swore that he did not see the said H. L., during the whole day of August 12, and that 'at the time he the said prisoner swore as aforesaid it was material and necessary for the said T. S., so being such justice as aforesaid, to inquire of and be informed by the said prisoner whether he did see the said H. L. at all during the said 12th day of August,' and it was held that the indictment was bad; for 'it is not stated that it was a material and necessary question in the inquiry before the said T. S., to which the false and corrupt answer was given. It may have been, therefore, consistently with the averments in the indictment, material and important for T. S. in some other matter, and not in the matter stated to be in issue before him, to have put this question and received this answer. Now as the offence of perjury consists in taking a false oath in a matter stated to be in judgment before a Court or person having competent authority to decide it, and as this indictment does not clearly and distinctly charge that, it does not charge the offence of perjury' (m).

An indictment for perjury said to have been committed on a trial for rape alleged that it was a material question whether the prisoner ever got one M. W. to write a letter for her, and whether or not she saw the said M. W. at the house of S. L.'s father when the said letter was written; and that the prisoner falsely swore that she never got a M. W. to write a letter for her, and that she did not see the said M. W. at the house of the said S. L.'s father. Whereas the prisoner did get the said M. W. to write a letter for her, &c. At the trial for rape, the prisoner was asked whether she ever got M. W. (who was pointed out to her in court) to write a letter for her. She replied: 'No, I did not.' And repeated her denial, after being shewn the letter, and also denied ever having seen M. W. at S. L.'s father's house. The falsity of what she so swore was clearly proved and the letter produced. It was objected, 1st, that the materiality of the matters assigned as perjury was not sufficiently alleged; 2nd, that the reference to the letter was too vague and general, and not properly pointed to the particular letter; 3rd, that the references to M. W. and to S. L.'s father's house were not properly introduced by an averment; 4th, that the letter produced was not sufficiently identified with the statements on the record to support them. The objections were overruled at the trial, and, on a case reserved, it was urged that all the assignments of perjury were defective in not identifying the M. W. spoken of in them with the M. W. spoken of in the allegation of materiality; but it was held that the indictment was sufficient: it averred that it was a material question whether the prisoner got any M. W. to write a letter. That averment comprehended every person of the name of M. W. The description therefore in this averment was larger than the description in the assignments of perjury, and comprehended the M. W. there spoken of. As to the objection relating to the letter, it was contended that it could not possibly be material that the prisoner got Williams to write a letter. But it was held that, as there was an express averment that it was material, that averment let in evidence to prove its materiality, and when the evidence was looked at it was clear that the letter was material (n).

An indictment for giving false evidence before a commissioner of bankruptcy alleged that upon the examination of the prisoner it was material to inquire what was the extent of the dealings of the prisoner with 'one M., and how long he had known the said M.,' &c., and then alleged that the prisoner solemnly declared that 'M. is the landlord of No. 4, York-terrace,' &c. 'I have known M. two or three years,' &c., whereas the said person so described was the same person as one S. M. Legge, and was the father of the prisoner, &c. It was objected, in arrest of judgment, that there was nothing to connect the allegation of materiality with the assignment of perjury, as there was no innuendo that M. meant S. Legge; and the judgment was arrested as the averment of materiality was insufficient to connect it with the other parts of the indictment (o).

An indictment for perjury alleged that a cause came on to be tried before a County Court judge, and that it became a material question on the trial whether J. H. B. had, in the presence of the prisoner, signed at the foot of a certain bill of account, purporting to be a bill of account between a certain firm called 'B. and Co.' and J. W., a receipt for the payment of the said bill, and that the prisoner falsely swore that J. H. B. did in her presence sign the said receipt. It was proved that on the trial the prisoner produced an invoice of goods, at the foot of which was a receipt, which purported to bear the signature of B., and swore that B. in her presence wrote and signed that receipt. B. had on other occasions signed receipts in the presence of the prisoner at the foot of invoices. It was objected that the indictment did not sufficiently specify the account and receipt to which the evidence related on which the perjury was assigned; but, it was held that the indictment was sufficient, as it was only necessary to refer to the receipt as introductory to making out the materiality of the perjury (p).

Where an indictment for perjury alleged that the defendant swore that he had not written certain words in the presence of one D., and (n) R. v. Bennett, 2 Den. 240; 3 C. & K. 124; 5 Cox, 207. It is trusted that the text represents substantially the grounds of the decision on the two points; but all three reports are very unsatisfactory. No alleged that it was a material question whether the defendant had so written such words in the presence of D. ; it was held that the indictment was sufficient ; for the question whether the words were written in the presence of D. might have been material ; and it was impossible to assume the contrary against the record (q).

Where an indictment for perjury on the taking of an inquisition before a coroner alleged that it ' was, upon the taking of the said inquisition, a material question whether,' &c., it was held that the statement sufficiently imported that the question was material to the subject-matter of the inquisition (r).

An indictment alleged that it was a material question whether, before the execution of a bond, it was agreed between certain persons that the prisoner should lend W. £1500 before the title to certain premises was investigated by the prisoner, and before any mortgage thereof was executed to secure repayment thereof, and that they should execute the bond to secure the prisoner the repayment of the said sum and interest in case the title should turn out to be defective, or the mortgage should not be duly executed ; but if the title turned out to be good, and the mortgage was executed, they were not to be liable on the bond ; and then alleged that the prisoner falsely swore that nothing was said by him or in his hearing about the bond being a temporary security, or a security until the mortgage was prepared, 'or any thing of the kind.' It was objected that, according to the agreement as stated, the bond would be binding until the title turned out to be good, which would not necessarily be when the mortgage was executed, so that the bond would not necessarily be a temporary security. But it was held that the exact terms of the alleged agreement were not material ; for the prisoner swore that there was no agreement ' of the kind ' (s).

An indictment for perjury alleged that, on the trial of an indictment for an assault, with intent to commit a rape, and for a common assault, upon one A. B., the said A. B. swore that she was the wife of one J. B., and had been married to him at such a time and such a place, whereas she was not the wife of the said J. B. and had never been married to him. The indictment contained an allegation of materiality, which was insensible in consequence of an error in copying it from the draft ; it was, nevertheless, contended that it sufficiently appeared on the face of the indictment, that the evidence on which the perjury was assigned was material on two grounds. First, that on any indictment for an assault, with intent to commit a rape, it was most material, not only as affecting the credit of the witness, but as going to the very gist of the charge itself, whether the party assaulted had falsely sworn that she was a married woman. Secondly, that by swearing that she was the wife of J. B., the prosecutrix supported the allegation that the assault was upon ' A. B.,' which would have failed if she had admitted that she was not married to J. B. But it was held that it did not sufficiently appear that the evidence was material ; it might or might not be material, and that was not sufficient (t).

Where an indictment stated that a cause was set down for trial, and appointed for a particular day, and that the defendant in that cause, before that day, made an affidavit before a judge, in which he stated that he had a good defence to the action, which he would be able to prove at the trial, and that some of the bills on which it was brought were void for usury, and then assigned perjury on these allegations; it was objected that the indictment was clearly bad: the only manner in which such an affidavit could be in a judicial proceeding, or the matters contained in it become material, would be upon an application to postpone the trial of the cause; but the indictment did not shew that any such application was made or intended. Tenterden, C.J., however, held that the occasion, on which the affidavit was intended to be used, might be sufficiently collected from the indictment, and refused to stop the trial, as the defendant, if there was any weight in the objection, might have the benefit of it after he was convicted (u).

In R. v. Gardiner (v), the seventh count of the indictment charged that the defendant, intending to aggrieve C. F. E., came before a certain magistrate (having authority, &c.), falsely, &c., did depose, swear, and charge, and gave the said magistrate to be informed that the said C. F. E. had been guilty of an abominable crime, then capital, the details of which charge were then set forth as deposed to. It was objected that this count did not distinctly shew any proceeding pending before the magistrate; that they ought to have averred directly that a charge was pending, and R. v. Pearson (w) was cited. But Patteson, J., thought that case distinguishable, because of the words 'upon an information and examination,' &c. (x). It was also argued that, although the state of C. F. E.'s dress was averred in the count to be material, yet by such averment was meant, not whether the flap of his trousers was unbuttoned, but the trousers generally; and that the count alleged that the prisoner charged the capital offence, whereas, by his information, he appeared to have charged only an attempt. The last two objections were taken before verdict, and did not apply in arrest of judgment, as was also an

Ann B., without any further description. The learned judge expressed an opinion that the indictment was insufficient before the case went to the jury, but he left it to them, and after they had found the prisoner guilty, arrested judgment, in order that the prosecutor might bring a writ of error if he thought fit. 'It sometimes happens that upon an objection taken to an indictment before verdict, the judge who tries the case, if he considers the objection valid, directs an acquittal; but the course adopted by the learned judge in this case is certainly the better course, as, if the decision be incorrect where the judgment is arrested, it may be reversed upon error; whereas if the prisoner is acquitted, and the decision is incorrect, there is no means of correcting the error, and as the verdict of the jury has been taken, it may be very questionable whether if a fresh indictment were preferred a plea of autrefois acquit might not be successfully pleaded. See R.

v. Fowle, 4 C. & P. 592, Tenterden, C.J. In R. v. Purchase, C. & M. 617, Patteson, J., after consulting Cresswell, J., refused to allow any objection to be taken to an indictment for embezzlement, except upon demurrer or in arrest of judgment, and it seems most in accordance with the regular course of proceeding that such a course should be adopted in all cases.' C. S. G. Writs of error in England have been abolished by the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, and the prosecutor has no means of relief if an indictment is wrongly quashed.

objection whether the evidence of J. H. E. did not go to any material fact sufficient to satisfy the rule as to two witnesses in cases of perjury. On all these questions, Patteson, J., requested the opinion of the judges, and all the judges present held the conviction good on the seventh count (y).

Falsity : Assignments of Perjury.—The indictment should expressly contradict, and without any ambiguity, the matter falsely sworn to by the defendant. An assignment in general terms seems to be demurrable. Possibly it might be supplemented by ordering particulars where it is not demurred to or thus supplemented. General averment that the defendant falsely swore, &c., upon the whole matter, is not enough : the indictment must proceed by particular averments (or, as they are technically termed, by assignments of perjury), to negative that which is false. More than one assignment of perjury, in the same evidence, may be included in the same count (z). It may be necessary to set forth the whole matter to which the defendant swore, in order to make the rest intelligible, though some of the circumstances had a real existence : but the word ‘falsely’ does not import that the whole is false ; and it is not necessary to negative the whole, but only such parts as the prosecutor can falsify, admitting the truth of the rest (a). In negating the defendant’s oath where he has sworn only to his belief (b), it is proper to aver that ‘he well knew’ the contrary of what he swore (c). An assignment of perjury may, in some instances, be more full than the statement of the defendant, which it is intended to contradict. Thus, where the fact in the affidavit, in which the defendant was charged to have perjured himself, was, that he never did, at any time during his transactions with the commissioners of the victualling office, charge more than the usual sum of sixpence per quarter beyond the price he actually paid for any malt or grain purchased by him for the said commissioners as their corn-factor ; and the assignment in the indictment, to falsify this, alleged that the defendant did charge more than sixpence per quarter for and in respect of such malt and grain so purchased ; it was objected that the words in respect of might include lighterage, freight, and many collateral and incidental expenses attending the corn and grain jointly with the charge for the corn or grain, and, that bearing such sense, the defendant was not guilty of perjury ; but the objection was overruled (d).

(y) Most of the judges seem to have held good other counts of the indictment which had been challenged on similar grounds.

(z) In R. v. Rhodes, 2 Ld. Raym. 886, 887, the indictment contained several assignments in one count, all bad, except one on which a conviction took place. The Court refused to arrest judgment. Cf. R. v. Virrier, 12 A. & E. 317. R. v. Gardiner, 2 Mood. 95 ; 8 C & P. 737. Compagnon v. Martin, 2 W. Bl. 790. In R. v. Nicholls, Gloucester Sum. Ass. 1838, perjury was alleged to have been committed by the defendant in evidence given on a trial for larceny, in which he denied having been at a particular house on a particular occasion, and denied having had a conversation with certain persons there. The indictment contained many distinct assignments on the going to the house, and the conversation, upon all of which evidence was given ; and Patteson, J., directed the jury simply to consider whether the defendant had been to the house, and if they were satisfied that he had, to convict him, which they did. MSS. C. S. G. R. v. Leefe, 2 Camp. 134, seems to be wrong, in so far as it suggests that distinct assignments of perjury must be in different counts.

(d) R. v. Atkinson, Dom. Proc. 1785. Bac. Abr. tit. ‘Perjury’ (C).

An indictment alleged that it was material, on the hearing of an information before justices of the peace, to prove that cards were played in the bar of a publichouse between the hours of six o'clock and eight o'clock on a certain evening, and that the prisoner falsely swore that he was in the bar of the said house from between the hours of six o'clock and seven o'clock until nine o'clock in the said evening, and that he did not play at any game at all, and that no cards or game of cards at all were or was during all the said last-mentioned time or between the hours aforesaid played therein; whereas the prisoner did between the hours of six o'clock and eight o'clock in the said evening play at a certain game of cards. It was held that the indictment was bad. The prisoner might have played at five minutes past six, and yet not have played from between six and seven until nine; the words 'from between six and seven' might be any time short of seven, five minutes or five seconds to that hour. The indictment could not be read as averring that the prisoner swore that he did not play at any time during that evening, but merely that he did not play at a particular period of that evening, namely, from some period before seven until nine. That might be perfectly true, and yet he might have played between six and seven, and so may have played, as is assigned in the indictment, between six and eight (e).

The averments introduced to negative the matter sworn ought to be so distinct and definite as to inform the defendant of the particular and precise charges which are intended to be proved against him. An indictment for perjury committed in the Insolvent Debtors Court alleged, that the defendant swore in substance that his schedule contained a full, true, and perfect account of all debts owing to him at the time of presenting his petition; whereas the said schedule did not contain a full, true, and perfect account of all debts owing to him at that time. It was held that the indictment was insufficient, as it was quite impossible that the defendant could know, from allegations so vague and indistinct, what was to be proved against him; the allegations conveyed no information whatever of the particular charges against which the defendant ought to be prepared to defend himself (f).

Where an indictment for perjury, alleged to have been committed in the Insolvent Debtors Court, stated that the defendant gave in his schedule on oath that the same and all its contents were true, and contained a full, true, and perfect account of all his just debts, credits, &c., and then went on to state that the said schedule and its contents were not true, and that certain persons whose names were set out were debtors to the defendant at the time of giving in his schedule; Tenterden, C.J., held that the evidence must be confined to the cases specified in the indictment, as the defendant could only come prepared to answer those cases, and that evidence that other persons, whose names were not set out in the indictment, were also debtors to the defendant and were omitted in the schedule, was inadmissible (g).

An indictment charged the prisoner with the offence of making a false declaration before a justice, that he had lost a pawnbroker's ticket, 'whereas in truth and in fact he had not lost the said ticket, but had sold, lent, or deposited it, as a security to one S. C., &c.' It was held that the allegation 'but had sold, lent, or deposited it, &c.,' did not render the indictment ambiguous or uncertain, but was pure surplusage, which might be rejected, and need not be proved (h).

An indictment for perjury alleged that the defendant made an affidavit, which stated that the creditors of the defendant were all, with two exceptions (which were explained), paid in full; whereas the said creditors were not all, with two exceptions only, paid in full; and whereas divers creditors of the defendant exceeding the number of two, naming several creditors, were not paid in full; and evidence was being tendered of debts to other persons than those named being unpaid. It was objected that the first assignment was bad as too general, and that evidence as to debts due to others than those named ought not to be admitted. Tindal, C.J., said: 'You might have demurred to this assignment only, if it be too general; and as you have not done so, I do not see how I can exclude the evidence.' But he added: 'I think that omitting the names in one assignment of perjury and inserting them in the next is likely to mislead the defendant; as he would be very likely to suppose that the debts, mentioned in general terms in one assignment, were those particularised in the other'; whereon the evidence was not pressed (i).

Contrary Depositions.—An information stated that H. before a committee of the House of Commons being duly sworn deliberately and knowingly and of his own act and consent did say and give in evidence, &c., setting out the evidence so given. The count then averred that the said defendant at the bar of the House of Lords being duly sworn deliberately and knowingly and of his own act and consent did say, swear, and give in evidence, &c.: setting out in like manner the latter evidence, which was directly contrary to that given before the House of Commons; and concluded (after averments as to the identity of the persons and places referred to in the evidence on both occasions), 'and so the jurors aforesaid do say that the said H. did not commit wilful and corrupt perjury.' The information was held bad for not shewing and averring in which of the two depositions the falsehood consisted (j).

Innuendoes.—If there be any doubt on the words of the oath, which can be made more clear and precise by a reference to some former matter, it may be supplied by an innuendo; the proper office of which is to fix and point the meaning of something previously averred (k), or to explain the insertion in the indictment of a word omitted in the document, e.g., in an affidavit in which the false oath was contained (l). Where an objection borough, C.J., where the indictment stated that the defendant went before a justice of the peace, and swore in substance to the effect following, that is to say, &c., and part of the deposition so set forth was that a person therein named assaulted the deponent with an umbrella, and, at the same time, threatened to shoot her with a pistol; but when the deposition was produced it appeared that, after stating the assault was taken to an indictment, that it added, by way of innuendo to the defendant's oath, 'his house situate in the Haymarket in St. Martin in the Fields,' without stating by any averment, recital, or introductory matter, that he had a house in the Haymarket, or (even admitting him to have such a house) that his oath was of and concerning the said house, so situated, the objection was overruled, on the ground that the innuendo was only a more particular description of the same house which had been previously mentioned (m). In the same case, the oath of the defendant being that he was arrested upon the steps of his own door, an innuendo that it was the outer door was held good (n). If the innuendo, and the matter introduced by it, are altogether impertinent and immaterial, and can have no effect in enlarging the sense, they may be rejected as superfluous (o).

An indictment stated the presenting of a petition to the House of Commons concerning the election of B., and setting out the petition, which stated the said B. before and at the election was guilty of bribery, and that certain agents of the said B., being trustees of divers public charities, before and at the said election were guilty of various corrupt acts, &c., in order to procure the return of the said B. The indictment then averred that one C. was a trustee of divers of the said public charities, and 'that shortly before the said election (to wit), on, &c., the said C., the said B., and other persons, went to the house of one W. V. for the purpose of soliciting the said W. V. to vote for the said B. at the said election.' The indictment then stated that certain members of the House of Commons were chosen to try and determine the merits of the said election, and that the said persons so chosen met to try and determine the matter of the said petition. The indictment then averred that S. V. appeared 'as a witness before the said select committee touching the matter of the said petition,' and that the said S. V. was duly sworn, &c. 'And it then and there became and was a material question, whether at the time aforesaid, when the said C., the said B., and the said other persons, so went to the house of the said W. V., the said C. said that he would give the said W. V. £6 out of the funds of one of the aforesaid charities at Christmas, whereof the said C. was trustee as aforesaid, or that he would give him £6 at Christmas' (p). And that the said S. V. falsely, &c., did depose, &c., to the select committee 'touching the matters and merits of the said election and the matter of the said petition, that before the said election a canvassing party came to her husband's house, and B. and C. came into the house of the said W. V., and that C. said he would act like a sensible man, and "I will give him the £6 at Christmas"' (q). 'Whereas in truth and in fact the said C. did not at the said time when the said B., the said C., and other persons went to the said house of the said W. V. to solicit him to vote as aforesaid, or during the time when, on that occasion, they were in or at the said house, say to the said S. V. that the said C. would give to the said W. V. the £6 at Christmas, or any sum of money from or out of any of the said public charities, or any sum of money whatsoever at Christmas or at any other time' (r). A motion on arrest of judgment on conviction of perjury was dismissed and the considered judgment of the Court was: 'Upon this indictment a motion has been made to arrest the judgment upon two objections: First, that the allegation of the oath having been taken "touching the matter of the said election, and the matter of the said petition," did not sufficiently point to the matter whereupon the defendant was alleged to have given evidence; and, secondly, that there was nothing to fix the alleged gift and promise of money to the said visit on the 6th of July. We think, however, that neither objection is sustainable. As to the first, it does sufficiently appear that a competent trial was had, that a material question arose as to the existence of certain facts, to which the defendant deposed, and was therein guilty of perjury. Now although it is certainly true that the averment stating the oath to have been "touching and concerning the matters and merits of the said election, and the matter of the said petition," does not directly refer to what are alleged to be the material questions which arose, yet, where it does sufficiently appear, both by averment and otherwise, that the oath was upon a material point, the allegation "touching and concerning," &c., is wholly superfluous and unnecessary, and the indictment would have been sufficient if it had omitted that part altogether, and had merely stated that the defendant deposed and swore "as follows," &c. The second objection is, that the evidence, upon which the perjury is alleged to have been committed, is not referred with sufficient distinctness to the said canvassing visit, and that the innuendo by which it is attempted so to apply it, introduces new matter, and is therefore bad. We, however, think otherwise; for an introductory averment expressly states that there was, in fact, such canvassing visit, and the innuendo directly refers thereto. It is plain, therefore, that this case comes within the rule laid down by De Grey, C.J., in R. v. Horne (s), which has always been recognised as the true one; and that the innuendo does only point and fix the meaning of something previously averred, which is the proper office of an innuendo, and that it does in no respect enlarge it. We think, therefore, that there is no ground for arresting the judgment' (t).

Conclusion.—Since 1851 (u), it has been unnecessary for an indictment for perjury to have a formal conclusion whether it be perjury at common law (v), or under statute. In some cases a count is concluded in a

(v) In R. v. Thornhill, Salop Summer Assizes, 1838 (reported on another point, 8 C. & P. 575), on an indictment for perjury before a revising barrister, it was held that under 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 45, s. 50 (rep.), his sittings were a court, and the false swearing in it perjury at common law, and need not be described as against the form, &c., though punishable under s. 52. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 41. In R. v. De Beauvoir, 7 C. & P. 17, the indictment seems not to have concluded 'against the form,' &c. See the note at the end of the case. In *R. v. sylogistic form, being and so the jurors on their oath aforesaid say that the defendant on &c., at &c., before &c., did commit wilful and corrupt perjury. Perjury is not a word of art like murder, and such a conclusion is unnecessary if the false oath was sufficiently alleged in the earlier part of the indictment, and where it is superfluous mistakes in it are immaterial (w).

Defects.—If the indictment is defective it may be amended in matters within 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, and if bad may be quashed (x) on motion to quash or demurrer, or judgment may be arrested if the defects have not been cured by verdict. None of these modes of challenging an indictment is specifically abolished by the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (post, Book XII. Chapter IV.).

Judges at nisi prius have sometimes refused to try indictments for perjury which were clearly bad on the face of them. An indictment for perjury charged that one A. B. had been convicted of certain offences, and that A. B. afterwards obtained a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted, and that the defendant, in order to prevent the said rule from being made absolute, made the affidavit whereon the perjury was assigned, but there was no averment that the matters falsely sworn were material, nor could it be collected from the indictment that they were so; and Garrow, B., having consulted Abbott, C.J., who concurred with him in opinion that the indictment was clearly bad, held that it was the duty of the judge not to proceed to try the case (y). So where in an indictment for perjury the allegations negating the matter sworn, were so vague and indistinct as to convey no information of the particular charges against the defendant; Abbott, C.J., after consulting the other judges of the Court of King's Bench, ordered the case to be struck out of the list (z). A judge will not allow counsel to argue at length at nisi prius the invalidity of an indictment, for the purpose of inducing the Court to refuse to try it, as that is not the time or place to discuss such disputed questions (a).

These rulings all relate to the very rare cases in which an indictment for perjury was removed by certiorari and tried at nisi prius, and seem to depend on the limitations of the nisi prius commission, for in ordinary cases such indictments would simply be quashed. Under the Judicature Acts trials at first instance are no longer subject to these limitations.

Deacon, Ry. & M. 27, Abbott, C.J., refused to try an indictment for a forcible entry, which was bad for want of alleging that the entry was manu forti, although the counsel for the defendant insisted that the case should proceed in order that the defendants might have the benefit of an acquittal by a jury, as they intended to institute proceedings for a malicious prosecution.

In this case the defendant's counsel pointed out the objections in order to induce the Court to stop the trial, and Tenterden, C.J., said that 'it might be convenient sometimes for counsel to suggest a point on which an indictment is clearly bad, to save the time of the Court.' In R. v. Hepper (ante, p. 503), and R. v. Tremearne (ubi supra) the objections to the indictment were pointed out by the Court.

Evidence.

Corroboration.—Where the defendant on arraignment pleads guilty to the perjury charged, or where he has made a confession or admission (b), that his previous statement on oath was false (c), corroboration is not necessary to warrant his conviction and sentence. But in all other cases the evidence of one witness is not sufficient to convict the defendant on an indictment for perjury. This rule is founded upon the general apprehension that it would be unsafe to convict in a case where there is merely the oath of one man to be weighed against the oath of another (d). The rule does not extend to all the facts, which are necessary to be proved on the trial of an indictment for perjury; but only to the proof of the falsity of the matter upon which the perjury is assigned. Thus, the holding of the court, the proceedings in it, the administering the oath, and even the evidence given by the defendant, may all be proved by one witness (e).

Nor is the rule to be understood as establishing that two witnesses are necessary to disprove the fact sworn to by the defendant; for if any material circumstance is proved by other witnesses, in confirmation of the witness who gives the direct testimony of perjury, it may turn the scale and warrant a conviction (f).

In R. v. Roberts (g) the prisoner was indicted for having falsely sworn that P. never was out of his sight between the hours of 7 a.m. and 10 a.m. on a certain day, and two witnesses proved that they saw P. at 8.30 a.m. on that day near L., but could not tell whether the prisoner was in sight of P. or not, as the fences were high. Another witness proved that at 9 a.m. the same morning he saw the prisoner alone and on foot at a place more than six miles from L. It was objected that the assignment of perjury was not proved by two witnesses. Patteson, J., said: 'It is necessary to have two witnesses to prove an assignment of perjury; but there need not be two witnesses to prove every fact necessary to make out an assignment of perjury. If the false swearing be that two persons were together at a certain time, and the assignment of perjury that they were not together at that time, evidence by one witness that at the time named the one was at London, and by another witness that the other was at York, would be a sufficient proof of the assignment of perjury.'

The rule applies to every assignment of perjury in the indictment. Where, therefore, an indictment contains several assignments of perjury, it is not sufficient to disprove each of them by one witness; but in order to convict on any one assignment, there must be either two witnesses, or one witness and corroborative evidence, to negative the truth of the matter contained in such assignment. In R. v. Parker (h) the prisoner was indicted for perjury alleged to have been committed in an affidavit to obtain a criminal information, in which he had sworn that he had paid all his debts, except two, as to which there was an explanation, and there were several assignments of perjury averring that he had not paid certain persons who were named (besides the two excepted ones), and such persons proved that they had not been paid, but only spoke to their respective debts not having been paid; Tindal, C.J., held that this was not sufficient, and that as to each debt there should be the testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness, and such confirmatory evidence as was equivalent to the testimony of a second witness (i).

In R. v. Hare (j), where an assignment of perjury was in the vague terms that defendant falsely swore that he had not treated a certain person to brandy, &c., on a certain day, instead of in the definite terms, that he had not treated him at a particular public-house, on a certain day, it was held, that proof of treating at two public-houses by two distinct witnesses was sufficient to support a conviction, because any witness of a treating at a separate time and place on the same day was sufficient corroboration of a witness who spoke only to one act of treating.

In R. v. Champney (k), Coleridge, J., is reported to have said: 'One witness in perjury is not sufficient, unless supported by circumstantial evidence of the strongest kind; indeed, Lord Tenterden, C.J., was of opinion that two witnesses were necessary to a conviction.' In a later case, R. v. Yates (l), where the evidence of one witness went in support of all the assignments of perjury, and to confirm him another witness was examined as to a conversation between himself and the defendant, and some entries in the defendant's books were given in evidence; it was submitted that there was no evidence to go to the jury; that the rule is that a case of perjury cannot be submitted to the jury on the evidence of a single witness; and as to the evidence of confirmation, it was not enough that there should be some evidence in confirmation, as in an ordinary case at nisi prius, where some evidence is necessary to prevent a nonsuit; but it must be such evidence as, in the opinion of the judge, is really confirmatory in some important respect, and equivalent to the positive testimony of a second witness. Coleridge, J., said: 'I think that the case must go to the jury, but I also think without the slightest chance

(i) In R. v. Mudie, 1 M. & Rob. 128, Tenterden, C.J., had expressed a doubt on this point. The indictment was for perjury, alleged to have been committed by an insolvent debtor in falsely swearing to the correctness of his schedule, the defendant's account book, given by him to the Insolvent Debtors Court, was put in, and several persons, whose names were specified in the indictment as debtors, and omitted in the schedule, appeared in the book as debtors to the defendant, and 'paid' was marked to their accounts in the defendant's writing. These persons were called, and stated that they did not pay until after the petition and schedule. It was objected that this was not sufficient evidence, inasmuch as it was only oath against oath, the defendant having sworn that the debts were paid; a single witness, with respect to each particular debt, swore that it was not paid at the particular time of the schedule.

Tenterden, C.J., said: 'I feel the force of the objection. It is a very important point whether the defendant's book, and the oath on one side, be not met by the oath of the witnesses on the other side. It would be very difficult to give any other evidence. I will not stop the case. If the defendant is convicted, you can move for a new trial.' The defendant was acquitted on other grounds.

(k) 2 Lew. 258. The same point is said to have been ruled by the same learned judge in R. v. Wigley, ibid. note. Mr. Starkie observes, 'And semble that the contradiction must be given by two direct witnesses, and that the negative supported by one witness and by circumstantial evidence, would not be sufficient. It has been so held (ut audiui) by Tenterden, C.J.' 3 Stark. Evid. 860, note (g).

of a verdict for the Crown. The rule that the testimony of a single witness is not sufficient to sustain an indictment for perjury, is not a mere technical rule, but a rule founded on substantial justice; and evidence confirmatory of that one witness in some slight particulars only, is not sufficient to warrant a conviction.'

In R. v. Towey (m), an indictment for perjury committed on the trial of a 'civil bill' in Ireland, alleged that the prisoner, T. T., falsely swore that 'the note produced is not my handwriting, or any part of it, and the name "T. T." as a witness is not in my handwriting.' The note purported to bear the marks of P. and J. T. as makers of the note, and had on it, 'Witness present, T. T.' The payee of the note could not read, but he identified the note, and swore that he saw T. T. write on the paper, and saw P. and J. T. put their marks on it. Another witness proved that he had subpoenaed T. T. to appear at the sessions as a witness, and that the prisoner then said that there was no occasion to test (subpœna) him; that he would go to prove the note; and that at a meeting between the parties to try to settle the civil bill, on the payee of the note saying he had J. T.'s note, and would take the law on it unless he signed a new one, T. T. said that he had been tested (subpœnaed) to come there, but that there was no occasion to test him; that he would prove the note. But the note was not produced at this meeting. It was held that this evidence was a sufficient corroboration of the evidence of the payee. The prisoner was the only witness to the note, and he could only prove it in his character as a witness, and, therefore, when he said he could prove it, it came to sufficient evidence that he was the witness to the note.

In R. v. Boulter (n) the indictment alleged that in June, 1851, the prosecutor had distrained upon the prisoner's goods for certain arrears of rent, and that the prisoner on trial at nisi prius falsely swore that there was only one quarter's rent due at the time of the said distress. On the trial for perjury the prosecutor positively swore to the fact of there being five quarters' rent due at the time of the said distress; and produced his books by which he refreshed his memory; and for the purpose of corroborating his statement, the son of the prosecutor deposed to a conversation with the prisoner in August, 1850, in which the prisoner admitted that three or four quarters of the said rent were then due. The jury convicted; but, upon a case reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that this was not sufficient corroboration. There was nothing in the evidence of the son relevant to the issue. There was a year's interval between the transaction he spoke of and the time when the distress was made, and the money might have been paid intermediately. The oath of the son was quite as consistent with the oath of the prisoner as with that of the prosecutor. In perjury there must be something to make the one believed rather than the other, and there was no such evidence in this case (o).

(o) In Best, Ev. (10th ed.), s. 609, it is said to be a question whether 'the old rule and reason of the matter are satisfied unless the evidence of each witness has an existence and probative force of its own, independent of the other; so that, supposing the charge to be one in which the law allows condemnation on the oath of a single witness, the evidence of either would form a case proper to be left to a jury, or would at least raise a strong suspicion of

In R. v. Virrier (p), where there were three assignments of perjury upon evidence relating to one and the same transaction, at one and the same time and place, it seems to have been considered that the jury ought not to convict on one of the assignments, although there were several witnesses who corroborated the witness who spoke to such assignment on the fact contained in the other assignments. The assignment was that she falsely swore that B. shook hands with her, and put something into her hand, and told her to give it to her husband, and that it was a sovereign wrapped up in some paper. Evidence was given in support of all the assignments of perjury. Denman, C.J., in summing up, said that as to the second assignment the proof lay almost entirely in the evidence of one witness, and, therefore, he did not see how the jury could convict of the perjury imputed; but that on the others there was a distinct contradiction of the defendant's testimony by C. and several other witnesses; and he left it to the jury to say whether there were not a strong body of evidence clearly supporting C.'s denial (q).

In R. v. Gardiner (r) upon an indictment for perjury, alleged to have been committed in making a charge of an unnatural offence, in which the defendant had deposed that he saw the prosecutor committing the offence, and saw the flap of his trousers unbuttoned, and that he was there five minutes; the prosecutor swore that he did not commit the offence, and that his trousers had no flap; and to confirm him his brother proved that at the time in question the prosecutor was only absent three minutes, and that the trousers he had on, which were produced in court, had no flap. Patteson, J., held that the corroborative evidence was quite sufficient to go to the jury; and upon a case reserved, the judges held the conviction right (r). So where perjury was alleged to have been committed by the defendant, who was an attorney, in an affidavit made by him to oppose a motion to refer the defendant's bill of cost to taxation, and to prove the perjury one witness was called, and in lieu of a second witness, it was proposed to put in the defendant's bill of cost delivered by him to the prosecutor; it was suggested that this was not sufficient, as the bill had not been delivered by the defendant on oath. Denman, C.J.: 'I have quite made up my mind that the bill delivered by the defendant is sufficient evidence, or that even a letter, written by the defendant, contradicting his statement on oath, would be sufficient to make it unnecessary to have a second witness' (s).

(p) 12 A. & E. 317.

(q) Denman, C.J., considered the most convenient mode of summing up the case to be to treat the second assignment as the first, and the first and third as one, and did so leave the case to the jury, who found a verdict of 'not guilty on the first assignment of perjury for want of sufficient evidence, and guilty on the second,' but said nothing on the third, and the verdict was entered accordingly. The Chief Justice did not at the time make any note of his summing up, but did so afterwards; and having a distinct remembrance of it, and no doubt of the jury's intention, he (on the summons) allowed the postea to be amended by entering a verdict of 'guilty' on the first and third assignments, and 'not guilty' on the second; but the Court afterwards held that the amendment ought not to have been made, there being no note or memorandum of the judge or other document to amend by.

he received the money in packages, and afterwards counted it, and found it £7 short; this statement was held not to be corroborated at all by evidence of another person, who also counted it, but had not been present when the money was received (t).

An indictment alleged that the prisoner falsely swore at a petty sessions that R. was the father of her illegitimate child. A witness other than R. proved that the prisoner had said that R. 'had never touched her clothes' at a time when she generally denied being in the family way. It was ruled that though, under some circumstances, such a statement might have been a sufficient corroboration of the evidence of R., yet this negation was so far a part of the general denial that the jury could not safely convict upon it alone (u).

In R. v. Hook (v), Wightman, J., said: 'It is not necessary that there should be two independent witnesses to contradict the particular fact, if there be two pieces of evidence in direct contradiction. Here one piece of evidence is that the prisoner himself is proved to have made statements directly contrary to his statement on oath; that alone would not do; but in addition to that you have the oaths of other witnesses, which go to shew that that which he stated when not upon oath was true; and therefore you have two pieces of evidence. I ought rather to put it that, instead of two witnesses being necessary to prove each fact, you must have the evidence of two persons giving evidence in contradiction to what has been sworn to by the prisoner; as, one witness who could prove, as in this case, that on other occasions the prisoner had stated that which was diametrically opposed to that which he has sworn, and the other witness to give evidence of that which is directly opposite. You have therefore two contradictions: you have the contradiction of the prisoner himself, as deposed to on oath by one witness, and you have the contradiction of another independent witness, who speaks to the falsehood of the fact: you, therefore, have two independent contradictions on oath.'

Contradictions by Defendant.—In R. v. Knill (w), where the defendant had been convicted of perjury, charged to have been committed in an (t) R. v. Braithwaite, 1 F. & F. 638; 8 Cox, 444, Watson, B., and Hill, J. In the latter report it is stated that 'the prosecutor took it without counting it, and carried it to a Mrs. Watson's, and counted it over.' In the former, 'The prosecutor took it without counting it, and carried it to an adjacent lane, where he counted a part of it, and found it wrong; he then gave it to a Mrs. Watson, and asked her to count it over.' Mrs. Watson was the witness called to corroborate B.

(u) R. v. Owen, 6 Cox, 105, Martin, B. In R. v. Webster (1 F. & F. 515; 8 Cox, 187) a count alleged that the prisoner falsely swore that she had shewn to one C. certain invoices bearing certain dates. C. swore that the prisoner had not shewn him the invoices she had sworn to, but that she had shewn others; and he produced a memorandum, he had made privately at the time, of the dates of the invoices, which shewed that they were not the same as those sworn to by the prisoner. Cockburn, C.J., is said to have held the private memorandum to be a sufficient corroboration. If this case is correctly reported, it deserves reconsideration. The memorandum was not itself admissible, and could only be used to refresh the memory of the witness; so that the whole statement rested on his single oath; and, even if the memorandum had been admissible, it would only have been the written statement of the witness and not on oath; and the time when it was made and the veracity of its statements must have rested on his single oath. See R. v. Lara, 6 T. R. 565, in support of this reasoning. In R. v. Boulter, supra, p. 510, it was not even suggested that the prosecutor's books could be used to corroborate his evidence.

examination before the House of Lords, the only evidence was a contradictory examination of the defendant before a committee of the House of Commons. Application was made for a new trial, on the ground that in perjury two witnesses were necessary, whereas in that case only one witness had been adduced to prove the corpus delicti, namely, the witness who deposed to the contradictory evidence given by the defendant before the committee of the House of Commons; and it was insisted that mere proof of a contradictory statement by the defendant on another occasion was not sufficient, without other circumstances shewing a corrupt motive, and negating the probability of any mistake. But the Court held that the evidence was sufficient, the contradiction being by the party himself, and that the jury might infer the motive from the circumstances (ww). In an anonymous case (x) a man swore before a justice of the peace, that three women were concerned in a riot at his mill (which was dismantled by a mob on account of the price of corn). Afterwards, at the session, when the rioters were indicted (having been tampered with in their favour) he then swore they were not in the riot. Perjury was assigned on the oath that the women were in the riot; there was no evidence to prove that they were, but the defendant's own original information on oath, which was produced and read. The judge thought this evidence sufficient, and the defendant was convicted (y).

These two decisions, if correctly reported, appear to be contrary to first principles and to be virtually overruled by the series of cases next to be stated.

In R. v. Wheatland (z), on an indictment for perjury, alleged to have been committed on the trial of an indictment for larceny, it appeared that the defendant had sworn to several material facts before the committing magistrate, but when he was called on the trial, denied the whole of what he had stated before the magistrate. R. v. Knill and Anon. (a) were cited to shew that the contradiction by the oath before the magistrate would alone be sufficient evidence to convict the defendant; but Gurney, B., held, that it was not sufficient to prove that the defendant had, on two different occasions, given directly contradictory evidence, although he might have wilfully done so; but that the jury must be satisfied affirmatively that what he swore at the trial was false, and that would not be sufficiently shewn to be false by the mere fact that the defendant had sworn the contrary at another time; it might be that his evidence at the trial was true, and his deposition before the magistrate false. There must, he held, be such confirmatory evidence of the defendant's

(y) The Precedent-book of Chambré, J., cited 5 B. & Ald. ibid., suggests that when the same person has by opposite oaths asserted and denied the same fact, the one seems sufficient to disprove the other; and with respect to the defendant (who cannot contradict what he himself has sworn) is a clear and decisive proof, and will warrant the jury in convicting him on either, for whichever is given in evidence to disprove the other, it can hardly be in the defendant's mouth to deny the truth of that evidence, as it came from himself.

deposition before the magistrate, as proved that the evidence given by the defendant at the trial was false (b).

And in R. v. Hughes (c), where a prisoner was indicted for perjury in evidence given before a grand jury, and her deposition on the hearing of the charge before the committing magistrate was put in to shew that the statement before the grand jury was false; Tindal, C.J., held, that further evidence must be given; for if the two contradictory statements on oath alone were proved, non constat which was the true one (d).

In R. v. Jackson (e), where the prisoner was indicted for perjury, and it appeared that she had made two statements on oath, one of which was directly at variance with the other; Holroyd, J., is reported to have said: 'Although you may believe that on one or other occasion she swore that which was not true, it is not a necessary consequence that she committed perjury; for there are cases in which a person might very honestly and conscientiously swear to a particular fact, from the best of his recollection and belief, and from other circumstances at a subsequent time be convinced that he was wrong, and swear to the reverse, without meaning to swear falsely either time. Again, if a person swears one

(b) In R. v. Knill, the Court held that 'the jury might infer the motive from the circumstances,' none of which are stated in the short minute of the case; some of them might have been such as to shew that the one statement was false, or the other statement true. In the Anonymous case the defendant had been tampered with after his first examination, and the evidence of the tampering with the defendant might be such as to lead to the conclusion that his evidence on the trial was false. But supposing those cases go the length of establishing the proposition, that the defendant's own evidence upon oath is sufficient to contradict the evidence on which the perjury is assigned, it is conceived they cannot be supported. The prosecutor may charge the perjury either on the one statement or on the other, and whichever he selects it is clear that the defendant could not avail himself of a plea of autrefois acquit, or convict in case he were subsequently indicted for the other, and therefore he might be twice put in jeopardy, and perhaps twice convicted for the same offence. The judgment in R. v. Harris, 5 B. & Ald. 926, is conclusive to shew that this is a good objection. Again, such evidence leaves it wholly uncertain which of the two statements is true; now it is a clear rule of criminal law that if the evidence on the part of the prosecution leaves it wholly uncertain whether the crime charged has been committed or not, the defendant must be acquitted; and as to the observation that 'it can hardly be in the defendant's mouth to deny the truth of the evidence that came from himself,' it must be remembered that there are two statements upon oath, and if he is to be concluded from denying one to be true, the same reason would conclude him from denying the other, and it would surely be unreasonable to hold that he is concluded to deny the truth of whichever the prosecutor may think fit to select. It is conceived, also, that an indictment charging each of the statements to be false in separate counts could not succeed. The charges being directly contradictory the one to the other, it may be doubted whether the grand jury would be warranted in finding such an indictment; or, if found, whether it would not be bad on the face of it; and as the defendant could only make a defence to one charge by proving himself guilty of the other, the judge would probably insist upon the prosecutor electing on which charge he would proceed. But supposing these difficulties to be surmounted, it is not easy to see how it would be possible for the jury to find a verdict without any evidence to shew which statement was false. If they found a general verdict they would at one and the same time find each of the statements to be both true and false, unless indeed they were satisfied that the defendant had, upon both occasions, wilfully sworn to matters about which he had no knowledge at all. Ante, pp. 476, 502. C. S. G.

(c) 1 C. & K. 519.

(d) The false statement before the grand jury was that certain tablecloths were the property of the prisoner's son, and she had sworn before the magistrates that they were her husband's; and evidence of the state of the family was given to prove that the latter statement must be true; but Tindal, C.J., thought that there was so much doubt whether the prisoner might not have sworn under a misapprehension, that he directed an acquittal.

thing at one time, and another at another, you cannot convict where it is not possible to tell which was the true and which was the false.

And in R. v. Hook (f), the prisoner, a policeman, laid an information against a publican for keeping open his house after lawful hours on the fast day, and on the hearing of the information swore that he knew nothing of the matter, except what he had been told by another person, and that ‘he did not see any person leave the publican’s house after eleven’ on the night in question. Perjury was assigned on this last allegation. It was proved by the clerk of the magistrates that the prisoner on laying the information said, he had caught the publican; he had last night seen four men leave his house after eleven; one of them he could swear to; it was W.; he knew him by his coat. Another witness proved that the prisoner, on another occasion, made the same statement to him. A third witness, W., proved that, on a third occasion, the prisoner repeated the statement with the variation, ‘One I can swear to; it was your brother.’ It was proved that W. and others had left the house on that night after eleven. The prisoner on the hearing of the information acknowledged that he had offered to smash the case for 30s. He told another witness he should make the publican give him money to settle it; another witness heard him offer the publican to settle it for £1, saying he was risking perjury; and another witness proved that the prisoner owned he had received 10s. to smash the case, and was to have 10s. more. It was objected that there was no sufficient evidence, as these were only the statements of the prisoner not on oath against that on oath. But, on a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right. In addition to the statements of the prisoner, there were strong confirmatory circumstances. The prisoner’s offering to smash the case for one pound, his admitting that he had received 10s. and was to receive 10s. more, and his talking of making the publican pay to settle it, are strong evidence to shew that what he stated upon his oath was false, and that his statements not upon oath were true (f).

In this case Pollock, C.B., expressed a doubt whether a conviction could thereafter be permitted in such a case as R. v. Knill (g).

Proof of Former Trial.—Where the former trial was of a civil action in any branch of the High Court of Justice (h), the record is proved (i) by the production of the original by an officer of the Court, under order of a judge or master (R. S. C. Ord. LXI., rules 28, 29), or of an office copy (j).

Thus upon an indictment for perjury charged as having been committed on the trial of an action in the High Court of Justice, the not now any judgment roll. Under the old practice, final judgment was entered before any roll was carried in, and an entry in a judgment book, stating that interlocutory judgment had been signed in an action, and final judgment afterwards entered, was held enough to prove the entry of such judgment without producing the judgment roll or an examined copy. *R. v. production by the officer of the Court of the copy writ filed under Ord. V., rule 7, and the copy pleadings filed under Ord. XLI., rule 1, and by the solicitor for the defendant in the action of the order to discuss the action were held sufficient evidence of the existence of the action (k).

A minute written by the officer of the Court on the jury panel, verdict for damages 1s., was held sufficient evidence of a trial at nisi prius, though the nisi prius record on production had no postea endorsed (l).

Where the perjury is assigned on a former trial for felony or misdemeanor, the former trial may be proved by certificate of the officer having custody of the records of the court where the former trial took place (m).

Where the former trial was before a jury it is not necessary to prove that their verdict was given on all the issues sent down for trial (n), nor even that they gave any verdict, if they have in fact been sworn and have tried the case (o). Whatever the form of trial, the material thing to prove is that there was a trial. Its result is immaterial to the issue of perjury, and the judgment or conviction (p) is not admissible as evidence that the perjury assigned was committed. Nor are statements made by the judge in giving judgment on the former trial admissible against a witness or a prosecution for perjury in his evidence given at that trial (r).

On an indictment against T. R. for suborning one M. to commit perjury, it was contended on the part of the Crown that the bare production of the record of M.'s conviction was of itself sufficient evidence that he had, in fact, taken the false oath as alleged in the indictment. But it was insisted, for the prisoner, that the record was not of itself sufficient evidence of the fact; that the jury had a right to be satisfied that such conviction was right; that R. had a right to controvert the guilt of M.; and that the evidence given on M.'s trial ought to be submitted to the consideration of the present jury; and the Recorder obliged counsel for the Crown to go through the whole case in the same manner as if the jury had been charged to try M. (s).

with the indorsement of the prisoner's plea, the verdict, and sentence of the Court thereon, together with the minutes of the trial, made by the officer of the Court, are at common law sufficient evidence of the former trial, without a regular record or any certificate thereof (t).

Quarter Sessions.—The sessions book containing the orders and other proceedings of a Court of Quarter Sessions made up and recorded after each sessions, with an entry containing the style and the date of the sessions, and the name of the justices in the usual form of a caption, no other record being kept, is good evidence of the trial of an appeal against an order of removal (u).

County Court.—Where an indictment is preferred for perjury committed on the hearing of a plaint in the County Court, the proper mode of proving the proceedings in that Court is to produce the Court book containing a note of the plaint or a copy of the minutes bearing the seal of the Court, and purporting to be signed and certified as a true copy by the registrar of the Court under s. 28 of the County Court Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43) (v).

Ecclesiastical Court.—An indictment for perjury alleged that a certain suit was instituted in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, in which M. S. M. was plaintiff, and J. T., J. H. T., W. B. W., and W. T. A., defendants; and in order to prove this allegation, an officer from the registrar's office in the Prerogative Court produced from the office an original allegation put in on behalf of M. S. M. and the original allegation put in on behalf of the executors in answer to it, and proved the signatures of two advocates, who acted as advocates in the Court, to each of the allegations. This was held sufficient proof of the suit having been instituted as alleged (w).

Proof of Authority to administer the Oath.—It is sufficient, to support the averment that the party administering the oath had competent authority for that purpose, to shew in the first instance that he acted as a person having such authority. Thus, upon an indictment for perjury before a surrogate in the Ecclesiastical Court, it was ruled, that the fact of the person who administered the oath having acted as a surrogate was sufficient prima facie evidence of his having been duly appointed, and having authority to administer it. And Ellenborough, C.J., said: 'I think the fact of Dr. P. having acted as surrogate is sufficient prima facie evidence that he was duly appointed and had competent authority to administer the oath. I cannot for this purpose make any distinction between the Ecclesiastical Courts and other jurisdictions. It is a general presumption of law, that a person acting in a public capacity is duly authorised so to do' (x). But upon its appearing that the surrogate was appointed contrary to the canon (which requires that no judicial act shall be speeded by any ecclesiastical judge, unless in the presence of the registrar or his deputy, or other persons by law allowed in that behalf), it was held that his appointment was a nullity and the averment that he had authority to administer the oath was negatived (y). Where perjury was assigned upon an affidavit sworn before C., a commissioner, &c., and it was proved that C. acted as a special commissioner for taking the affidavits of parties in prison, or unable from sickness to attend before a judge; Patteson, J., held that this was sufficient evidence that C. was a commissioner, and that it was not necessary to prove the commission under which the affidavit was taken, upon the general principle that a person acting as a public officer must be taken to have authority as such, and that a commissioner for taking affidavits came within that principle (z). An affidavit was alleged to have been sworn before R. G. W., a commissioner, 'then and there being duly authorised and empowered to take affidavits in the said county of G. in or concerning any cause depending in Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer.' It was proved that W. had acted as a commissioner for taking affidavits in the Court of Exchequer for ten years; that he had never seen his commission, but had directed it to be applied for ten years before through his agent, and had been told by him that it had been granted. It was held that W.'s acting as a commissioner was prima facie evidence that he was so (a).

Bramwell, B., held that the proceedings on hearing the plaint could not be proved by the assistant clerk of the Court. In R. v. Ward, 3 Cox, 279, Maule, J., held that want of proof of a county court summons was answered by the fact of the prisoner's appearance, which might be proved by parol.

On an indictment for perjury in a County Court, Maule, J., held that proof that the judge acted in the capacity of a judge of the Court in pursuance of and under the County Courts Act, 1846 (repealed), was sufficient (b).

The same rule applies to deputy judges of County Courts (c).

Where a question arises whether by the practice of a Court an affidavit is prescribed or required, the rules of practice should be proved by an official copy (d) or by an officer who can verify the practice (e).

Where the jury is assigned on an oath before a Court or person with limited jurisdiction it is necessary to prove such facts as would give jurisdiction to administer the oath (f). This rule was applied in several cases under the old bankruptcy law where the jurisdiction of commissioners of bankruptcy to examine a bankrupt depended on the existence of a good petitioning creditor's debt (g) or the fact of bankruptcy (h).

information is necessary to give the justices jurisdiction to take the evidence on which the perjury is assigned, it is necessary to prove the issue service, &c. (i), or that its absence or defects were waived (j). Proof of such matters may also be necessary in order to ascertain the nature of the proceeding before the justices from the point of view of the materiality of the false evidence (k).

An indictment alleged that the prisoner appeared at petty sessions in pursuance of a summons requiring him to answer a complaint of A. J. touching a bastard child of which she alleged him to be the father (l), and alleged that he committed perjury on the hearing of that complaint. The magistrates' clerk produced a book containing the minutes made by him on the occasion, headed 'Ann J. v. R. N., affiliation,' and then the evidence was set out. There was no other evidence of the proceedings before the justices. It was objected that the summons ought to have been produced, or notice to produce it served on prisoner. Wightman, J., said: '7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, provides that "upon complaint by the mother, the justices shall have power to summon the putative father, and upon the appearance of the person so summoned, or upon proof of the service of the summons, to hear and adjudicate upon the case." A summons was, therefore, necessary to give the magistrates jurisdiction to hear the case; and to prove that they had jurisdiction in this case it must be proved that the prisoner was duly summoned, either by production of the summons, or by secondary evidence, after notice to the prisoner to produce it. The minutes of examination in this case were no more than the minutes of a shorthand writer' (m).

It has been ruled that on indictments for perjury before justices, if the proceeding there was on a written information it must be produced, or its loss or destruction accounted for (n).

Petty Sessional Courts now have a register of the minutes and memorandums of all the convictions and orders of the Court, and all proceedings directed by rules of Court to be registered (o). The register is prima facie evidence only in the Court for which it is kept (p).

Upon trial for perjury committed at the hearing of an information in bastardy, the indictment alleged the application for a summons, the issuing thereof, and the hearing upon it, proof of the information, of the appearance of the defendant, of the hearing, of evidence being given on both sides, and of no objection being made of the want of a summons, was held sufficient to shew jurisdiction in the justices who heard the information, without proof of the summons which issued upon that information; and a conviction for perjury upon the indictment was upheld (g).

Proof of the Oath.—The taking the oath must be proved as it is alleged, unless the indictment is amended. Therefore, if it is averred that the defendant was sworn upon the Holy Gospels, &c., it will not be enough to prove that he was sworn in some other manner (r). Where the allegation in an indictment was, that on the trial of an action the prisoner 'was duly sworn, and took his corporal oath on the Holy Gospel of God,' and the proof was that the witness was sworn and examined; and it was objected that the particular mode of swearing must be proved, as the evidence given would apply to the oath of a Jew, or person of any other religion than the Christian; Littledale, J., held the proof sufficient, as the ordinary mode of swearing was the one specified (s). Where an indictment stated that the prisoner was sworn to speak 'the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth,' and it was proved that the oath taken was in the form, 'you shall true answer make,' this was held to be no variance (t).

It is necessary to prove that the oath was taken in a place over which the Court of trial for the perjury has jurisdiction, but, where the oath is proved to have been taken in the county in which the defendant is indicted, variance between indictment and proof as to the place of taking the oath are immaterial (u).

The recital of the place where the oath is administered in the jurat of an affidavit is sufficient proof that the oath was administered at the place named (v). Where, therefore, perjury was assigned on an answer in Chancery, and the defendant's signature to the answer, and that of the Master in Chancery to the jurat, were proved, and that Southampton Buildings, which the jurat recited as the place where the oath was administered, was in the county of Middlesex; Tenterden, C.J., held that this was sufficient proof that the oath was administered in Middlesex (w). So where on an indictment for perjury committed in an affidavit, the original affidavit was produced, and proved to be signed 'J. T.,' in the handwriting of the prisoner, and the jurat was 'Sworn in open court at Westminster Hall, the 10th day of June, 1846, by the Court,' and it was proved that the words 'By the Court' were in the handwriting of one of the masters of the Court, by whom the jurats of affidavits are signed when the affidavits are sworn in Court. It was objected that it should be shewn that the master was in Court when the prisoner was sworn before him. Erle, J., said: 'We have proof of the handwriting of the party sworn, and of the officer, who is authorised to administer the oath; and when an officer thus authorised writes under a proper jurat the words "By the Court," I think that that is sufficient evidence that the affidavit was sworn before him, and properly sworn in Court' (x). And upon an indictment in Middlesex, it may be shewn that the oath was in fact taken in Middlesex, although the jurat state it to have been sworn in the city of London (y). The prisoner must of course be identified as having sworn the oath.

On an indictment for perjury, in an answer in Chancery, sworn before the passing of the Judicature Acts, the bill must be produced and proved in the usual way (z). Proof of the defendant's signature, and that of the master before whom the answer purported to be sworn, was evidence of the defendant's having sworn to the truth of the contents, without calling the person who wrote the jurat, or proving the identity of the defendant as being the very same person who had signed the answer (a). But unless there was such proof of the defendant's signature, or some other sufficient proof to identify him as the person by whom the oath was taken, no return by commissioners or of a master in Chancery was sufficient (b). In a case upon 31 Geo. II. c. 10, s. 24 (for taking a false oath to obtain administration to a seaman's effects, in order to receive his wages), it was held necessary to prove, directly and positively, that it was the prisoner who took the oath (c).

On an indictment for perjury all the evidence referable to the fact on which the perjury is assigned must be proved (d): such prefatory averments and innuendoes as are stated in the indictment with this object (e). On an indictment for perjury on the trial of an action it was held sufficient to go to the jury if that a witness deposed for recollection the evidence given by the prisoner, though he did not take it down in writing, and could not say with certainty that it was all the evidence given by the prisoner, but could only say with certainty that it was all he gave on that point, and that he said nothing to qualify it (f).

Where a prisoner is indicted for perjury in evidence given on the trial of a cause, it is only necessary for the prosecution to prove so much of that evidence as is relevant to the matter in issue on the trial for perjury; but if the prosecution prove the whole of the prisoner's evidence on the former trial, and it refers to any deed or other document, which is so mixed up with it that it is necessary to be read in order to make the evidence intelligible, the prisoner is entitled to have it put in

There are rulings by Kenyon, C.J., that the whole of the defendant's evidence must be proved, unless the perjury is assigned on a point which first arose on his cross-examination. *R. v.
